To our knowledge, this is the only bond issue in Cook County that was worked out without one cent of cost to the bondholders for any kind of fee whatsoever.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to include the entire letter and enclosure in my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The letter referred to and the enclosure follow:

BERWYN, ILL., March 26, 1937.

Hon. A. J. SABATH,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Enclosed are copies of identical letters written to Hon. HATTON W. SUMNERS, Chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, and Hon. WM. B. BANKHEAD, Speaker of the House of Representatives, relative to the articles appearing in the Chicago press on March 25 and 26, concerning your congressional committee, and Mr. J. L. Tupy.

They do not adequately express the high regard in which Mr. Tupy is held by our office and by hundreds of bondholders that he has helped.

If there is any way that any member of our firm can be of assistance to you, by appearing in Washington at our own expense, we urgently request that you call on us without hesitation.

Very truly yours,

BERWYN AGENCY AND LOAN CORPORATION,
By CHAS. E. ZITNIK, Treasurer.

BERWYN, ILL., March 26, 1937.

Hon. HATTON W. SUMNERS,
Chairman of the House Judiciary Committee,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: There appeared in the Chicago papers of Thursday, March 25, 1937, several articles relative to the Sabath congressional committee. These articles contained reference to Mr. J. L. Tupy as a member of a "bondholders' committee" which handled a mortgage reorganization for the Chicago Park Cemetery Co., and inferred that Mr. Tupy had demanded a free of $45,000 for the committee's work in handling the bond issue of $150,000. This information was attributed to Representative CHURCH, of Illinois, in a speech before the House of Representatives on Thursday, March 25, 1937.

The facts in the case are so different from those stated by Representative CHURCH that I take the privilege of writing to you that justice may be done to Mr. Tupy and Congressman SABATH'S committee.

Mr. Tupy worked for this corporation from December 1932 to July 1934 and during that time he worked out the details of the reorganization of the bond issue in question in which an apparently worthless bond issue was turned into an issue worth 100 cents on the dollar without one penny in cost to the bondholders, either for attorneys' fees, committee's fees, trustee's fees, or any other fees commonly associated with a bondholders' committee. The only charge whatsoever was 1 percent on deposited bonds as depositary fee to handle the cost of depositary certificates, printing, mailing, and exchange for new bonds. The sole charge has not exceeded $800. Much of the credit for this workout is due Mr. Tupy, who spent endless months of intelligent labor in working out the details of this reorganization.

If this be the conniving and corruption that Representative CHURCH mentioned, then it is our prayer that there be more of the same in connection with bond reorganizations.

To our knowledge, this is the only bond issue in Cook County that was worked out without one cent of cost to the bondholders for any kind of fee whatsoever.

It is a matter of record that Mr. Tupy left our employ prior to his becoming associated with Congressman SABATH'S committee, and it is also a matter of record that Mr. Tupy never received one penny in fees of any kind or nature from this corporation, or from any committee in any reorganization handled by us.

We write this letter in fairness to a former employee who is still gratefully remembered by the bondholders whom he benefited through his excellent work.

Very truly yours,

BERWYN AGENCY & LOAN CORPORATION,
By ——— ———, Treasurer.

Mr. SABATH. My colleague also charged that Mr. Tupy has floated a bond issue on a property far in excess of the value of the property. I have positive evidence and sworn statements that that property on which the issue was $185,000, together with the land, was worth nearly $300,000, and that Mr. Tupy himself put in $99,000 of his own money that he saved during his lifetime and lost every cent of it.

The gentleman charges that Mr. Tupy remains in possession of, or occupies, two of the apartments. The court proceedings will show that he is in there by order of the court having jurisdiction in this matter. I hold in my hand and show you a picture of the apartment building which the gentleman says was over capitalized. Any man with any knowledge will see that it is a large apartment, covering nearly an entire block in Riverside, one of the finest suburbs of Chicago.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois makes other charges that the firm of Sabath, Perlman, Goodman & Rein obtained law business from protective committees and from the Chicago Title & Trust Co. individually because of my chairmanship of the select committee. I will prove to you, Mr. Speaker, and to each and every one of you gentleman, and to my colleague Mr. CHURCH, in a moment, how wrong——

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I object to the gentleman using names. I refrained. I ask that the gentleman, accordingly, leave the name out under the rules.

Mr. SABATH. With the greatest pleasure. I am only sorry that I am compelled to use it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] will suspend a moment. To what does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHURCH] object?

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I object to the gentleman's designation by name of the gentleman from Illinois as being in violation of the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman certainly, under the rules, can refer to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I relieve the Speaker and the House. I would be only too pleased if I could omit use of the gentleman's name altogether, although he used my name directly many times.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. No.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, apparently the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHURCH] does not want his name in the RECORD, although the name of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] appeared even in the newspapers.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to be heard on the point of order raised by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHURCH].

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. RAYBURN. It appears to me that if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] refers to his colleague from Illinois as "the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. CHURCH", there is no invasion of the rules of the House. How else could he designate the gentleman?

The SPEAKER. If the Chair were called upon to make that ruling, the Chair would so hold, but the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] said that he would adopt the suggestion made by his colleague the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHURCH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I will only use the gentleman's name when absolutely necessary in order that the fair name and reputation of other Members from my State may not suffer. [Applause.]

As I started to say, Mr. Speaker, I will prove in a moment how wrong the gentleman is in that accusation.

He mentioned cases. He stated that Sabath, Perlman, Goodman & Rein "ousted" the firm of Glenn, Schwartz, Reid & Browning as attorneys for the receiver of the Hyde Park-Kenwood National Bank, the implication being that this representation was secured as a result of my connection with the select committee. The fact, however, is that the firm was appointed to represent the bank receiver on August 21, 1933, 11 months before the select committee was created.

The gentleman read from a transcript of proceedings before Master Charles A. McDonald in the matter of 1748 East Seventy-first Street Building Corporation. He inferred that my firm inspired a hasty foreclosure.

My firm represented the receiver of the Hyde Park-Kenwood National Bank, who held securities on many buildings and on which he had to act to protect the depositors.

In this case the receiver held over $10,000 in bonds defaulted for over 2 years. The owner of the property had not paid taxes from 1928 and was in arrears in them for over $18,000. On June 14, 1934, the receiver addressed a letter to Sabath, Perlman, Goodman & Rein from which I quote:

I think it is high time a bill were filed and the matter brought to a conclusion.

Mr. Speaker, I also desire to include in my remarks a letter from the receiver dated June 14, 1935.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

HYDE PARK-KENWOOD NATIONAL BANK OF CHICAGO,
Chicago, June 14, 1934.

Re: Contemplated foreclosure, Granada Apartments, 1748–1762 East Seventy-first Place, Chicago, Ill.

SABATH, PERLMAN, GOODMAN & REIN,
10 South La Salle Street, Chicago, Ill.

(Attention of Mr. Chesler.)

GENTLEMEN: The owner of the above property, Mr. Benjamin J. Huttner, whose business address is 1636 East Fifty-fifth Street, and whose residence is 5457 Everett Avenue, this city, having failed to take care of interest due on bonds outstanding, of which I am now in control of $10,800, and being at the present time engaged in trying to convince holders of these bonds that they should extend them for 3 years from May 1, 1934, and take a reduction in interest from 5 percent to 4 percent, in addition to being reconciled to a previous reduction from 6 percent to 5 percent, and having allowed the taxes to become delinquent for 1928 and subsequent years in the approximate amount of $18,000 and penalties, and feeling that owners of these bonds should be satisfied with the above extension and his promise to take care of the taxes at the rate of $100 to $150 per month, apparently, so he can remain in possession of the property and use as much of the income as he sees fit, I think it is high time a bill were filed and the matter brought to a conclusion.

Six thousand three hundred dollars par value of the $10,800 worth of these bonds by me controlled are now a part of the bank's assets, this amount being received from Mr. Thomas J. Norton, the successor trustee of the Hyde Park collateral trust. The balance of the bonds are held as collateral to customers' notes, all of which notes are in default.

I am enclosing a list of these bonds, showing the number, date, amount, maturity, and the interest coupons attached, and which

I trust will be sufficient for you to start your bill, with the understanding that any additional information available in this office will be furnished upon demand.

Our records indicate the total loan floated amounted to $150,000, but I have no record to show the exact amount outstanding.

Yours very truly,

N. W. IRWIN, Receiver.

CHICAGO, ILL., June 16, 1934.

To: Chicago Title & Trust Co., as trustee under trust deed from Patrick W. Barrett and Anna N. Barrett, his wife, dated May 19, 1927, and recorded in the office of the Recorder of Deeds of Cook County, Ill., as document no. 9622078.

GENTLEMEN: Please be advised that the undersigned, N. W. Irwin, receiver of the Hyde Park-Kenwood National Bank, of Chicago, is the legal holder and owner of bonds nos. 41, 44, 57, 59, 62, 63, 74, 82, 121, 123, 130, 139, 145, 146, 147, 186, 204, 216, 217, 218, 219, 220, 221, 265, 284, 288, 298, 300, aggregating $10,800, executed by Patrick W. Barrett and Anna N. Barrett, his wife, to the Chicago Title & Trust Co., as trustee, dated May 19, 1927, and recorded in the office of the Recorder of Deeds of Cook County, Ill., as document no. 9622078, which bonds are identified by the signature of the Chicago Title & Trust Co., as trustee, and which are herewith handed you.

You are further notified that default has been made in the payment of the semiannual installment of interest on bonds no. 62 and 63, which became due and payable on November 1, 1931, and subsequent and, also, in the principal due on said bonds on May 1, 1934; that default has been made in the payment of the semiannual installments of interest on bond no. 57, which became due and payable on May 1, 1932, and subsequent and, also, in the principal due on said bond on May 1, 1934; that default has been made in the payment of the principal of bonds nos. 41 and 44, which became due on May 1, 1933; that default has been made in the payment of the semiannual installments of interest on bonds nos. 59, 74, 82, 186, 204, 265, 284, 288, 298, and 300, which became due and payable on May 1, 1933, and subsequent and, also, in the payment of the principal of each of said bonds which became due on May 1, 1934; that default has likewise been made in the payment of the principal amounts of bonds nos. 121, 123, 130, 139, 145, 146, 147, 216, 217, 218, 219, 220, and 221, which became due on May 1, 1934.

You are further notified that said defaults, and each of them, still continue.

You are further notified that the following taxes remain unpaid and are defaults under said trust deed, and said default and each of them still continue:

	Balance
1928 general taxes	$2,267.40
1929 general taxes	3,970.20
1930 general taxes	4,351.08
1931 general taxes	3,255.98
1932 general taxes	2,568.30

That the undersigned, as the legal owner and holder of all of the above-mentioned bonds, has, in accordance with the terms and provisions of said bonds and trust deed securing same, elected to declare, and does hereby declare, the principal sum of all bonds outstanding and unpaid by the said trust deed, together with interest thereon, immediately due and payable, and does hereby request you to institute a suit or suits in equity or in law, either for foreclosure of said trust deed, taking possession, or the sale of the premises described therein, or for such other appropriate practice as you shall deem most effective and desirable.

The undersigned hereby agrees to keep and save you secure and indemnified against the cost, expenses, and liabilities which may be incurred by you by reason of your taking such action, in accordance with this demand.

N. W. IRWIN,
Receiver of the Hyde Park-Kenwood National Bank.

Mr. SABATH. On June 16, 1934, the receiver demanded that the Chicago Title & Trust Co., as trustee, instruct the firm to file a foreclosure suit.

Theretofore, on September 5, 1933, which was about a year before the select committee was created, the following letter was addressed to Mr. Perlman by Mr. Abel Davis, of the Chicago Title & Trust Co. I quote:

In connection with your appointment as the attorney for the receiver of the Hyde Park-Kenwood National Bank, this is to confirm telephonic conversation of today that our company, as trustee under bond issues sold by the Hyde Park-Kenwood National Bank, will, in such foreclosure suits as may be filed hereafter, designate as its counsel any reputable firm of attorneys suggested by Mr. Irwin, the receiver. It goes without saying that we shall be happy to have Mr. Irwin designate your firm.

On September 9, 1933, still about a year prior to the formation of the select committee, the receiver wrote the following letter to the Chicago Title & Trust Co. I quote:

This is to advise you that the firm of Sabath, Perlman, Goodman & Rein are now my attorneys, and I hereby request that you employ them as solicitors in all foreclosure cases to be instituted by you as complainant, wherein I, as receiver of the Hyde Park-Kenwood National Bank, of Chicago, shall request such foreclosure proceedings to be instituted by you.

Very truly yours,

(Signed) N. W. IRWIN, Receiver.

CHICAGO TITLE & TRUST CO.,
ABEL DAVIS, CHAIRMAN OF THE BOARD.
September 5, 1933.

Mr. I. B. PERLMAN,
Sabath, Perlman, Goodman & Rein, 10 South La Salle Street, Room 1424, Chicago, Ill.

DEAR MR. PERLMAN: In connection with your appointment as the attorney for the receiver of the Hyde Park-Kenwood National Bank, this is to confirm telephonic conversation of today that our company, as trustee under bond issues sold by the Hyde Park-Kenwood National Bank, will in such foreclosure suits as may be filed hereafter, designate as its counsel any reputable firm of attorneys suggested by Mr. Irwin, the receiver. It goes without saying that we will be happy to have Mr. Irwin designate your firm.

Very truly yours,

(Signed) ABEL DAVIS.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire how much time the gentleman has remaining?

Mr. SABATH. I shall try to complete my statement within the time allotted me.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 8 minutes remaining.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois also stated that my firm represented the Chicago Title & Trust Co. in 50 or 75 cases. By this he evidently intended to infer that my firm was retained in such cases because of my connection with the select committee. There is no more truth in this than in the other statements he has made.

The representative of the Chicago Title & Trust Co., who was quoted by the gentleman from Illinois in apparent support of that statement referred to cases where holders of bonds, clients of the firm, and real parties in interest, requested the Chicago Title & Trust Co., as trustee, to have the firm prosecute foreclosures in which those clients were interested individually, in the same manner as the receiver of the Hyde Park-Kenwood National Bank, heretofore mentioned.

RIDGEWAY STATE BANK

The gentleman makes the same charge in the matter of the Ridgeway State Bank and he is utterly refuted by a telegram, dated March 26, 1937, which I received from Mr. Charles Weinfeld, of the firm of Schuyler, Weinfeld & Hennessey, and which I shall read:

I have read in the public press that Congressman CHURCH has stated that the attorneys for the Ridgeway State Bank were dismissed and the firm of Sabath, Perlman, Goodman & Rein were appointed. In fairness to you I feel it my duty to wire you that this was a misstatement as my firm at one time were the attorneys for said receiver and that subsequently, after we resigned, another law firm, not yours, was appointed by the State auditor. Your firm jointly with mine did represent the bondholders' committee of the Ridgeway State Bank under bondholders' agreement dated February 15, 1932, which was more than 2 years prior to the time that the select committee was authorized by Congress.

(Signed) CHARLES WEINFELD.

Mr. LUCAS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. LUCAS. Am I correct in my understanding that all the Chicago Title & Trust Co. cases which he, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHURCH], referred to the other day were cases where the trust company was nominally the plaintiff, or were received by the gentleman's firm prior to the time that he was appointed chairman of the investigating committee?

Mr. SABATH. Yes; and they were not the Chicago Title & Trust Co. firm. These were cases of people who owned securities on which defaults had occurred. The Chicago Title & Trust Co. was the so-called nominal trustee in Chicago. In 90 percent of the cases the Chicago Title & Trust Co. was made trustee, sometimes not even knowing that they had been made trustee; but when the time came to execute a release, they charged tremendous fees for signing the release.

Mr. LUCAS. Am I correct in my further understanding that since the investigating committee has been appointed the Chicago Title & Trust Co., in its individual capacity, has thrown the gentleman's firm no business whatsoever?

Mr. SABATH. Not a single case, as I have just explained, and the firm did not accept any since that time. As a matter of fact, the firm has refused to accept fees in matters under investigation by the select committee, even though they had been appointed in such cases before the select committee was created.

H. O. STONE & CO.

Again, the gentleman from Illinois makes a charge that the firm of Sabath, Perlman, Goodman & Rein represented the H. O. Stone & Co. protective committee.

In refutation of that charge, I quote a letter dated March 26, 1937, and signed by Mr. Avery Brundage, chairman of the protective committee:

The firm of Sabath, Perlman, Goodman & Rein has never represented this committee—

(Signed) AVERY BRUNDAGE.

HOLZER

The gentleman makes a charge, absolutely unfounded in fact, stating that the firm of Sabath, Perlman, Goodman & Rein represented the Leight-Holzer Co. protective committee.

There is no Leight-Holzer protective committee. That firm went out of business even before the depression. There is a Holzer, Inc., committee and a Leight & Co. committee, and here again the gentleman was inexcusably inaccurate. In direct refutation of that charge, I quote a telegram addressed to me, dated March 26, 1937, from Abram N. Pritzker, attorney for the Holzer, Inc., protective committee, reading as follows:

Information has reached me of a statement that you represented the committee reorganizing bond issues sold through the now defunct Holzer Co. of Chicago. As counsel for Holzer committee I am in a position to state positively that you did not represent that committee in any capacity.

LEIGHT & CO.

In the matter of Leight & Co. I have a letter from the law firm of Gottlieb & Schwartz, addressed to Mr. I. B. Perlman of my firm, dated March 26, 1937, which I quote:

This firm, in conjunction with the firm of Kirkland, Fleming, Green, Martin, and Ellis, represented, and now represents the committee for the protection of holders of bonds sold through Leight & Co. At no time have you or your firm represented this committee.

GOTTLIEB & SCHWARTZ.
By WILLIAM J. FRIEDMAN.

CODY TRUST

The gentleman from Illinois stated: "That the firm of Sabath, Perlman, Goodman & Rein represents a number of the committees for issues underwritten by the Cody Trust Co."

Again, in this instance, the gentleman infers that representation was had by reason of my connection with the select committee.

What are the facts? The members of the protective committee of the Cody Trust Co. were clients of M. W. Petacque associated with Sabath, Perlman, Goodman & Rein, for some time before 1933.

In December 1933, Cody Trust Co. went into receivership and one of its personnel, Mr. Albert J. Peterson, was given powers of attorney from holders of about $1,000,000 in its defaulted bonds.

At that time Mr. Peterson employed Mr. Petacque as the committee's counsel.

I call particular attention to the fact that this was about 8 months before the select committee was created. The successor trustee on Cody issues is the Chicago Title & Trust Co. and its counsel are Defrees, Buckingham, Jones & Hoffman, and Cassell, William & McCarthy. Sabath, Perlman, Goodman & Rein did not represent the Chicago Title & Trust Co.

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have 15 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask that there be no more requests submitted? I shall not object to this one.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, at the close of the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes and to quote a few paragraphs in eulogy of the President of the United States as a part of my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The question now pending is, Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MERRITT] that the time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] be extended 15 minutes?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understood we were going to be in session only a short time today, considering the sudden death of one of the oldest Members of this House. I feel that out of respect to the deceased Member we should adjourn in reasonable time, and for this reason I do not believe we should have speeches all afternoon.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I concur fully in what the gentleman has stated about our deceased Member, whom I have known and loved for more than 25 years.

Mr. SNELL. I feel that we should dispose of the business at hand and adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair may say that under the arrangement and understanding already had, the gentlewoman from New Jersey [Mrs. NORTON] will call up a few bills from the District of Columbia Committee, and unless that order is changed by unanimous-consent request, at the conclusion of the consideration of these few short bills the House will adjourn.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to object, but I feel it is a tribute we owe to our deceased colleague.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MERRITT]?

There was no objection.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] will complete his remarks in less than 15 minutes. I therefore ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] I may proceed for 5 minutes, and that the two Republican members of this committee may each have 5 minutes thereafter. This is just as much a question of personal privilege for the rest of us as it is for the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH], and we want to wipe the matter out now and forget about it. We ask for only a very few minutes, not to exceed 5. I think the two Republican members of the committee are entitled to an opportunity to address the House, and I think I am also.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. May I inquire what disposition, if any, was made of my request?

The SPEAKER. It has not been submitted. There was one request pending at the time.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas that at the conclusion of the extension of 15 minutes granted to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FULLER], the gentleman from New York [Mr. CULKIN], and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] may each be permitted to address the House for 5 minutes?

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Colorado rise?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. For the purpose of asking that my request be acted upon by the House.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] yield for that purpose?

Mr. SABATH. I yield for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] he may be permitted to address the House for 5 minutes, and to read a certain statement to which he has referred. Is there objection?

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to state the position of the Committee on the District of Columbia.

This is District day. We have just four short bills. Several Members have come to this desk to request time, and I have asked them to reserve their requests until the completion of the District business.

Mr. Speaker, I dislike very much to deny time to any Member, but it does seem only fair that the District complete its business, particularly as we have but four short bills on the calendar. At the completion of that business we shall be pleased to yield all time requested.

Mr. KRAMER. Mr. Speaker, I also should like to address the House for 2 minutes on behalf of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

LEGISLATIVE BRANCH OF THE GOVERNMENT APPROPRIATION BILL, FISCAL YEAR 1938

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. DOCKWEILER] to file a report?

Mr. SABATH. I am pleased to yield.

Mr. DOCKWEILER, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H. R. 5966) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 481), which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of matters upon the District of Columbia Calendar I may be permitted to address the House for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

SELECT COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE REAL-ESTATE BONDHOLDERS' REORGANIZATIONS

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman desires to learn about these protective committees with which my law firm had any connection, he should read the printed record of the hearings of the select committee. All of them were investigated, and no quarter was asked and none given.

The gentleman from Illinois repeatedly asserted that the select committee shielded the Chicago Title & Trust Co. in exchange for law business. Surely he could have learned how unfounded and ridiculous his accusations were. Easily he could have read the supplemental report of the select committee dated June 19, 1936, where the Chicago Title & Trust Co. is commented on without any shielding.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may include in my remarks excerpts from this report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. I quote:

> The Chicago Title & Trust Co. appears as trustees, depositary, manager, or in some other major capacity in about 65 percent of these defaults. Their influence is felt not only in the Federal but State courts as well. In nearly every outstanding proceeding involving a default they are, directly or indirectly, voluntarily or involuntarily, injected in such proceedings. * * *
> Actually, the trust company at all times was a partner for profit with the bank, and its pecuniary interests were placed ahead of its trust duties and obligations to the public. * * *
> An investigation by your committee resulted in the Chicago Title & Trust Co. agreeing to substitute some $200,000 worth of objectional mortgages found in this trust. * * *
> The Chicago Title & Trust Co. not only influences foreclosures and 74 and 77B proceedings, but instigates formation of bondholders' protective committees, on many of which its own officers and employees serve and are most active. Many bondholders' protective committees are domiciled in the executive offices of the Chicago Title & Trust Co. and are run by its paid employees, as secretaries, for which the Chicago Title & Trust Co. charges exorbitant fees.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that every fair-minded man or woman will admit that each insinuation, each charge, each accusation made against me and the four men who have worked with the select committee are baseless, and that I have demonstrated their untruth, not by the use of words but with actual evidence and facts.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] may insert the rest of his remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. In view of that, and because I have been a Member of this House continuously for over 30 years, during which time my honesty and integrity never have been questioned by anyone, and because in clear conscience during my entire service I have never been guilty of a wrongful act; because at all times I have had the interest of my people and my country at heart; because I have always felt proud of my small contributions to legislation here and of my record, I feel that you will agree with me when I say that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHURCH], whether intentionally or unintentionally, has wronged and unjustifiably and without any evidence attacked and assailed the good names of these four men and myself.

Therefore I feel that regardless of the motives he may have had, or if he was misled by others, that he should apologize to the House for the advantage he has taken in obtaining unanimous consent to make his unfounded and unmanly attack.

Re: H. O. Stone & Co. issues, Lawsonia properties.

Mr. CHARLES LEFEVRE,
6237 Vernon Avenue, Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR: During the investigation being made by this congressional committee it has arrived at an assumption that the original owners and holders of bonds on the above-named property may have a valid claim for recovery.

For the benefit of such bondholders it is desirable to place the question of probable recovery into hands of an attorney with view of presentation to proper courts.

To date, we understand, you have been led to believe that this investment is a total loss to you.

If you desire to share in any benefits which may develop, we ask you to sign enclosed authority so that an accredited attorney can be assigned to start proceedings. It is intended that this matter will cost you nothing unless recovery of some sort is obtained for you; in that case the attorney, and necessary accountants, handling the matter will expect to be paid on a contingent basis.

If you have transferred your bonds to someone else, please give us their name and address.

Should you not desire to concur in the above plan of procedure, please advise us. Otherwise, please sign the enclosed paper and return it immediately.

Respectfully yours,

ADOLPH J. SABATH, Chairman,
By J. L. TUPY,
Chicago Office, Room 703, United States Courthouse,
Chicago, Ill.

Re: Congressman CHURCH's statement in the House on March 25, 1937.

Hon. A. J. SABATH,
1136 House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: By your committee I was assigned to the Chicago Title & Trust Co. cases, and made a special study of an issue involving $12,500,000, wherein the trust company appeared solely as trustee (see Mr. Pettibone's testimony, vol. 6, public hearings of your committee), but under a secret agreement (exhibit A herewith) was deeply interested in the floating of the bonds. (See Mr. Abel Davis' testimony in the same volume.)

On June 27, 1935, I appeared before Judge Wilkerson and told the court that from my examination it appeared that the court was being imposed upon, and that the bondholders were being misrepresented. The court stated that he could not hear me as an attorney for your committee, but that if I appeared as a friend of the court he would do so. He further stated (this from the court record):

"You made statements here about the manner in which this trust has been handled. The court may take that, having in mind the source from which it comes, as the basis for some inquiry along those lines; but, of course, I can get it only from the evidence which develops; and the court will rely upon counsel in developing the evidence. The court, you know, just has to rule on the record which is made."

He also stated:

"This statute casts upon the court the duty of finding whether the plan is fair and nondiscriminatory. It is the duty of the court to avail itself of all sources of information, providing that the information comes to the court in such a way that the court is at liberty to consider it. If there is any specific matter in connection with this plan in which you think the court is interested, the court will issue the proper subpena and get that evidence in the record so that when the final action is taken the court will take not only what is presented by counsel but all the facts which are developed by your suggestions this morning. If you will indicate what they are, I will issue subpenas and bring the witnesses here and have all these things in the record."

One of the important charges made by me was the whitewash and attempted release of the Chicago Title & Trust Co. without it fully accounting for all of its acts as trustee.

The company, as trustee, had full power, under certain restrictions, to purchase the 400 mortgages in the trust. It was admitted that the trustee had purchased all of them from itself.

Through my work for the American Legion I had information that about December 1932 a memorandum had passed among the officers of the company concerning these mortgages, as follows:

"Some of the mortgages in the trust itself may be open to challenge in that, although when made they were 60-percent loans, by the time they were placed in trust the market security had declined in market value to such an extent that the loans then were more than 60-percent loans (the limit specified for in the trusts)."

I requested that the trustee give a report on these mortgages. The master overruled me, and in his report stated:

"The friend of the court insists that aside from the specific investments discussed above, the trustee is under a duty to justify generally its conduct of the trust; that the data which it has furnished are inadequate to show whether or not it has complied with the provisions of the declaration of trust; and that it should be required to submit full information in regard to all the mortgages purchased for the trust, showing among other things the date of the purchase, the taxes levied against the property at that time, the location and nature of the property, the amount of the mortgage, and the value of the property as appraised by the trustee, and the name of the mortgagor."

And this is what the record shows when on December 5, 1935, I presented my report and suggestions to the court:

"Mr. MECARTNEY. They (the trustee) are still liable to the bondholders for any malfeasance in office and the release should be left out of the plan because under all the law that I can find it says that the trustee shall not be released until it has made a full and frank disclosure.

"The COURT. I think that point should be given careful consideration if there were before the court a single bondholder who had, who was properly before the court and was here asserting the claim, proceeding against the trust company, for a breach of trust. But there is no bondholder before the court who has asserted any such right nor is asking to have the record in such shape so that can be done."

And that is the "every opportunity given to the friend of the court" as quoted from the master's report by Mr. CHURCH.

The record further conclusively shows (a) that the so-called protective committee used the United States mail to solicit the confidence of the bondholders and then in the exercise of their own judgment (master's report 23) permitted the bonds to go into default for failure to pay interest of $98,490 when they had on hand $230,000 in cash and $75,000 in Government securities and never advised the court of the facts although the court had taken sole jurisdiction of the trust.

That such action immediately caused the bonds to drop in market value and Farr, the chairman, and his associates who were also indebted to the bondholders, purchased nearly $300,000 in bonds sold by distressed bondholders at as low as 19 cents.

The master reported:

"It is impossible to approve the action of Mr. Farr in this respect. He put himself in a position where his personal interest was or might be opposed to the interest of the bondholders for whom he was acting in a fiduciary capacity. The syndicate purchased the bonds at close to the lowest price at any time; the purchases were going on for approximately a year from June 1933 to June 1934. During all of this period it was to the personal interest of Mr. Farr that the market price of the bonds should be as low as possible, in order that the syndicate might buy to the greatest advantage. On the other hand it was to the interest of the bondholders that efforts should be pressed forward to secure the maximum realization on the bonds, and as soon as conditions warranted, liquidating dividends of either income or principal. Activity along this line would tend to raise the market price of the bonds."

Farr was liable to the trust on a mortgage that came due 17 days after the default and was not paid until after he had made a handsome profit on the bonds purchased by him.

Farr also held 200 shares of stock in the Chicago Title & Trust Co. The master says of this (page 16):

"The master considers that it would have been better to omit the holder of such a substantial amount of stock of the trustee in making up the committee."

When the matter came up on December 5, 1935, before the court, I presented my report and after making the remarks hereinbefore quoted, the court absolutely refused to consider my report and suggestion, stating that it was because I did not represent any party in interest and in direct conflict with his inducement and promise of June 27, 1935, hereinbefore quoted.

That at the time of filing the petition I thought I would be able to finance an appeal, and that if the circuit court of appeals could take one look at the record, the bondholders would win millions of dollars.

To show that I had spent time and effort that was worth a considerable amount upon the inducement and promise of a duly authorized member of the judicial branch of our Government that he would fairly and justly consider all facts presented by me, and that when such facts and records were properly and fully presented, the promise was repudiated.

One fact stands out above everything else in this case, and that is, if there had been a conservator appointed, the court would have had to consider the facts and decided for the bondholders instead of against them, thereby saving them millions of dollars and the Federal and local taxpayers the cost of supporting them.

Respectfully submitted.

NEWELL MECARTNEY.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois rise?

Mr. LUCAS. To submit a unanimous-consent request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. Speaker, this is one of the most important matters that has come before the House for some time, and, while I appreciate the fact that this is District day and those matters are important, but character and reputation are involved in this debate, and I ask unanimous consent at this time that the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FULLER], the gentleman from New York [Mr. CULKIN], and my colleague the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], may each be granted the privilege of addressing the House for 5 minutes.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York makes a point of order there is not a quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, at the request of the majority leader, I ask my colleagues to withdraw the request, in view of the fact it is going to mean an adjournment.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I withhold the point of no quorum.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Speaker, I join my colleague in his request.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute to make a statement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, a great many of us here have served with the late Mr. FOCHT, of Pennsylvania, for many years. Frankly, we do not feel that today is an appropriate time to go into the kind of debate we are going to have, as has been developed here, and on tomorrow I may assure every gentleman here connected with this committee that if he submits the unanimous-consent request to speak on this subject I shall not object, and will try to keep down objections.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman will consent to unanimous-consent requests to allow the members of this special committee, whose integrity seems to be involved here, or at least their capacity for public service, adequate time?

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not know what the gentleman considers adequate time.

Mr. CULKIN. It may mean a matter of an hour to discuss some of the ramifications of the matter.

Mr. RAYBURN. I may say to the gentleman that I shall certainly agree to a reasonable time.

Mr. CULKIN. That will be satisfactory.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, my request for 15 minutes after consideration of District legislation was concluded was agreed to; but in deference to the wishes of the majority leader, if I had any reasonable assurance I could get at least as much time, or possibly more time, tomorrow, I would forego the time granted me for today.

Mr. RAYBURN. I may say to the gentleman that, so far as I am concerned, he can have his 15 minutes tomorrow.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Well, I could use more time than 15 minutes tomorrow and would, perhaps, ask for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] withdraw his request?

Mr. LUCAS. I withdraw the request, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Under the previous order of the House, the gentleman from Colorado is recognized for 5 minutes.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a speech I made on February 26 last.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

TREASURY AND POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 4720) making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments, disagree to the Senate amendments and request a conference with the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. LUDLOW, BOYLAN of New York, O'NEAL of Kentucky, HIGGINS, DALY, TABER, and DITTER.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on tomorrow, immediately following the reading of the Journal and the disposition of the special orders heretofore granted, I may address the House for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. As the Chair understands, the gentleman has yielded back the time heretofore granted him?

Mr. O'MALLEY. That is correct; and I have added 15 minutes to the time for tomorrow.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. O'MALLEY] on tomorrow I may be permitted to address the House for 5 minutes and to include in my remarks some brief paragraphs from a eulogy on the President of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands by this permission the gentleman desires to cancel his former request to address the House when it had no business before it?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, in view of the indefiniteness of the request and the fact that I might not be here when that time came, I withdraw the request. [Laughter.]

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BUSINESS

The SPEAKER. This is District day, and the Chair recognizes the gentlewoman from New Jersey [Mrs. NORTON].

PREVENTION OF BLINDNESS IN INFANTS

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the District of Columbia, I call up the bill (H. R. 5896) to provide for the prevention of blindness in infants born in the District of Columbia, and ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentlewoman from New Jersey calls up the bill H. R. 5896, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentlewoman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the health officer of the District of Columbia shall cause to be provided in suitable containers a 1-percent solution of silver nitrate or other preparation which in his opinion is suitable for use as a prophylactic against inflammation of the eyes of the new-born child, the contents of each container being the exact quantity necessary for the treatment of one eye, and two such containers shall be furnished for use in each case of childbirth. It shall be the duty of each physician, midwife, or other person in attendance upon any case of childbirth to administer immediately upon delivery such solution as a prophylactic against inflammation of the eyes of said new-born child. It shall be the duty of each midwife or other person, except licensed physicians, to secure containers of such solution from the health officer for use in each case of childbirth.

SEC. 2. Whenever any physician, midwife, or other person in attendance upon any case of childbirth finds that the new-born child has inflammation of the eyes, attended by a discharge therefrom, such physician, midwife, or other person shall communicate such fact in writing to the health officer within 6 hours after the existence of such discharge becomes known to such physician, midwife, or other person. Upon receipt of such communication the health officer, unless he finds such report to be incorrect, shall issue an order directing the parents of such child (or other person charged with its care) either to (1) place such child in the care of a registered physician or (2) submit immediately satisfactory proof of inability to pay for such medical service. If the health officer finds that the parents or such other person are unable to pay for such medical treatment, he shall order the parents (or such other person) to place the child in a hospital to be designated by the Board of Public Welfare and at the expense of said Board.

SEC. 3. No person other than a registered physician shall treat any case of inflammation of the eyes, attended by a discharge therefrom, of a new-born child for any period longer than may be necessary to obtain the services of a registered physician.

SEC. 4. Any person convicted of violating any provision of this act or any order or regulation issued pursuant to the provisions of this act shall be fined not more than $100 or imprisoned not more than 30 days, or both.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

In presenting this bill today may I pay my tribute of appreciation to the man who inspired the bill and who spent his life working to save the sight of countless thousands, Dr. William H. Wilmer. Only a few days ago Bishop Freeman conducted the ceremony and unveiled a bronze plaque at the chapel in the Washington Cathedral as a memorial to this great man. His widow appeared before the subcommittee conducting hearings on this bill and I feel safe in saying that her support of the bill and the story she told of Dr. Wilmer's interest in it had much to do with the unanimous report to your committee and to the House.

It is fitting that we, too, honor the memory of Dr. Wilmer by passing this bill today.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

BOWLING ALLEY ESTABLISHMENTS

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Joint Resolution 226, to amend section 7 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations to provide for the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes", approved July 1, 1902, as amended, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

House Joint Resolution 226

Resolved, etc., That paragraph 21 of section 7 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations to provide for the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes", as amended, be amended by striking out the period at the end of the paragraph, inserting a colon, and adding the following words: "Provided, however, That bowling-alley establishments licensed under this section shall be closed at midnight on Saturday night and shall remain closed until 2 o'clock postmeridian."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the House joint resolution.

The House joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SOUTHEASTERN UNIVERSITY

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 3406) for the relief of the Southeastern University of the Young Men's Christian Association of the District of Columbia, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the certificate of incorporation and certificate of amendment thereto for the incorporation of the Southeastern University of the Young Men's Christian Association of the District of Columbia under subchapter 1 of chapter 18 of the Code of Laws of the District of Columbia (1929 D. C. Code, title 5, ch. 6), be, and the same are hereby, approved and confirmed, except as herein specifically altered and amended.

SEC. 2. That the name of the corporation shall be "Southeastern University."

SEC. 3. That the management of the said corporation shall be vested in a board of trustees consisting of not less than 9 nor more than 21 in number as determined from time to time by said board of trustees, one-third of whom, at all times, shall be graduates of the said university, of the qualifications prescribed by the board of managers of the Young Men's Christian Association of the city of Washington, a corporation organized and existing under and by virtue of the act of Congress approved June 28, 1864 (13 Stat. L. 411 and the acts amendatory thereof), nominated by the alumni of the said university in the manner prescribed by said board of managers, and all of whom shall be elected by said board of managers; that C. C. Caywood, A. W. Defenderfer, L. W. DeGast, Charles E. Krey, George A. Lewis, George W. Offutt, John Poole, James P. Schick, H. Randolph Barbee, James A. Bell, Harvey T. Casbarian, and D. Roland Potter shall act as and constitute the first board of trustees under this act and shall be classified with respect to the time for which they shall severally originally hold office into three equal classes, the first class for the term of 1 year, the second class for the term of 2 years, and the third class for the term of 3 years; the respective original terms of office of any additional trustees shall be such as to equalize said three classes, as far as possible; and the successors to each said class of trustees shall severally hold office for the term of 3 years, so that the term of office of one class shall expire annually.

SEC. 4. That the said board of trustees is authorized to (a) make, alter, and repeal bylaws for the management of the said corporation and rules and regulations for the government of the university and the "schools", faculty, and students thereof; (b) elect as officers of the said corporation and fix the salaries of a president, a treasurer, and a secretary, and such other officers as it may find necessary, for the respective terms and with the respective powers and duties as fixed by the bylaws of the said corporation; (c) appoint, from among their number, as officers of the said board of trustees and fix the salaries of a chairman, a vice chairman, and a secretary, and such other officers as it may find necessary, for the respective terms and with the respective powers and duties as fixed by the bylaws of the said corporation; (d) remove any trustee when, in its judgment, he shall be found incapable, by age or otherwise, of performing or discharging, or shall neglect or refuse to perform or discharge, the duties of his office; (e) determine and establish from time to time additional "schools" in all departments of sciences, liberal arts, and the professions, and the courses of instruction therein; (f) determine and establish, from time to time, additional professorships; (g) appoint, from time to time, such deans, professors, tutors, and instructors as it may deem necessary, and fix their respective terms, duties, and salaries; and (h) grant and confer degrees, but only upon the recommendation of the appropriate "school."

SEC. 5. That the said corporation may have and use a common seal and alter and change the same at pleasure, and shall have power, in its corporate name, (a) to sue and be sued; (b) to plead and be impleaded; and (c) to acquire real, personal, and mixed property by gift, grant, purchase, bargain and sale, conveyance, will, devise, bequest, or otherwise, to hold, use, and maintain the same solely for the purposes of education, and to demise, let, mortgage, or otherwise lien, grant, sell, exchange, convey, transfer, place out at interest, or otherwise dispose of the same for its use in such manner as shall seem most beneficial thereto; subject to conforming to the express conditions of the donor of any gift, devise, or bequest with regard thereto accepted by it; provided it shall not hold more land at any one time than necessary for the purposes of education, unless it shall have received the same by gift, grant, or devise, in which case it shall sell and dispose of so much of the same as may not be necessary for said purposes within 15 years from the date of acquisition, otherwise the same shall revert to the donor or his heirs.

SEC. 6. That the income of the said corporation from all sources whatsoever shall be held in the name of the corporation and applied to the maintenance, endowment, promotion, and advancement of the said university and the said Young Men's Christian Association of the city of Washington, subject to conforming to the express conditions of the donor of any gift, devise, or bequest accepted by the said corporation, with regard to the income therefrom.

SEC. 7. That no person shall ever be required to profess any particular religious denomination, sentiment, or opinion as a condition to becoming and continuing a member of the faculty or a student, with the full benefits, privileges, and advantages thereof.

SEC. 8. That no institution of learning hereafter incorporated in the District of Columbia shall use in or as its title, in whole or in part, the words "Southeastern University."

SEC. 9. That nothing in this act contained shall be construed as preventing the Congress from amending, altering, annulling, or repealing the same or any part thereof.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. NORTON. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. This is a very important bill. It establishes a corporation, and it does some very unusual things in that it incorporates something that is in some office downtown. The bill does not state what it is.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. Yes.

Mrs. NORTON. We can have the bill explained by the chairman of the subcommittee that considered it.

Mr. MICHENER. It certainly ought to be explained. I have talked with some members of the committee, and they do not seem to know much about it.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield now to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH].

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, the legislation which the District of Columbia Committee brings to the House at this time calls for the incorporation of the Southeastern University of the Young Men's Christian Association of the District of Columbia and brings that university in its operation under the Federal incorporation similar to that which Congress has already granted to Georgetown University, George Washington University, National University, Catholic University, and Columbus University. Since May 15, 1923, the Southeastern University has been serving as an educational institution in the District of Columbia under the Board of Education of the District of Columbia, and operating under articles of incorporation recorded here in the District. We believe that the prestige of the institution will be aided by the Federal charter. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia have no objection to the passage of the bill, and the Superintendent of Schools of the District of Columbia, Dr. F. W. Ballou, believes that it would be a proper measure in view of the fact that the Congress has already established the custom of incorporating the other universities I have just named.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Why do we give a Federal charter for a university? I am asking this question for information, not that I am opposed to it.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I shall say to the gentleman that those institutions which have come before Congress and asked for Federal charters, which we have granted in the past, do it because the institutions obtain increased prestige. As recently as the Seventy-fourth Congress we gave a Federal charter to the Columbus University, operating here under the local organization of the Knights of Columbus. The Federal charters given to the schools have been made only to those operating here in the District of Columbia.

Mr. SNELL. What if an institution in my town should ask for a Federal charter? What would be the disposition of Congress in regard to it?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I could not say, except that it would be operating under a State charter, whereas here in the District we have been operating under the District of Columbia Board of Education prior to giving Federal charters.

Mr. SNELL. If they had a District of Columbia charter, would they not be in as good shape to go on and run a college as under a Federal charter?

Mr. RANDOLPH. The officials of the institution now coming here simply feel that the granting of Federal charters in the case of Georgetown, George Washington, National, Catholic, and Columbus requires, in all fairness, that it should be given to Southeastern University, the organization of the Y. M. C. A. of the District of Columbia.

Mr. SNELL. Just because we have done it before? There is no real reason that I can see.

Mr. RANDOLPH. The institution has grown, and now has almost 1,000 students, and additional prestige will be brought to the graduates of Southeastern.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. There are just two reasons. The first is the school wants the prestige of a national charter. This was stated to the committee. They want to say that the Congress of the United States has granted them a special charter. That is the first reason. The second reason is that under the law there is no agency of visitation or supervision over a corporation granted a Federal charter. If you incorporate under a State law, then you must submit to the corporation laws of the State. You must make reports. In other words, you are subject to visitation by some regulatory authority. Now, those seeking Federal charters want Federal permits from Congress to go out and do as they see fit, without regulation, without reporting to anybody at any time anywhere concerning the subject matter. These matters used to come before the Committee on the Judiciary, and that committee necessarily adopted the policy that they would not recommend Federal charters like this. Now they go over to the Committee on the District of Columbia. This is not incorporating under any District law. The Congress of the United States is going to grant a charter, a Federal charter, which should not be granted. I do not know anything about the school. I am against all Federal charters when not necessary. In the Seventy-fourth Congress, it is true, the Committee on the Judiciary refused, but did not keep watch of the thing, and some school went over to the Committee on the District of Columbia and got a Federal charter. Now, that committee finds itself right where the Committee on the Judiciary found itself. In other words, they will have one every week.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman state a little of the background of those who are seeking the charter? It is my recollection that they are connected with the Young Men's Christian Association, are they not?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Yes, sir.

Mr. McCORMACK. A very reputable organization. The school is located in the District of Columbia?

Mr. RANDOLPH. That is true.

Mr. McCORMACK. And every one of those that the gentleman has mentioned, which have received charters, are also located in the District of Columbia?

Mr. RANDOLPH. That is true.

Mr. McCORMACK. So that so far as this bill is concerned and the others that have been granted charters, we are acting as the legislative body of the District of Columbia?

Mr. RANDOLPH. That is my understanding.

Mr. McCORMACK. Just the same as the legislature of any State in granting a charter to a school or college located within the particular State would be acting in its legislative capacity. In other words, we are not sitting here as Congress in the consideration of this bill, but as the legislature of the District of Columbia; is that right?

Mr. RANDOLPH. That is right. I thank the gentleman for his contribution. He is always most fair.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. There is a procedure for incorporation along the line suggested by the gentleman, but these schools do not want to do that. They will not take that kind of a charter. They want a charter granted by this Congress, and they so advised this committee.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. Just to make this observation: There is no question about the reputation of those who are seeking this legislation?

Mr. MICHENER. Oh, no; I understand that it is a splendid school.

Mr. McCORMACK. If charters have been granted in the past to other colleges, it seems to me that in all fairness this bill should pass. If there is anything wrong about the method of this particular procedure, then that should be met in another way, but certainly it does not seem to me that we should interpose objection against the passage of this bill when other similar schools and colleges have received the same consideration in the past. If, as the gentleman from Michigan has stated, the whole thing is wrong, why create a barrier now? Why not let the proper legislative committee consider a bill preventing the granting of these charters in the future? But to apply it now would seem to constitute discrimination against those who are named in this bill.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK] asks, "Why not pass a law stopping this?"

Mr. McCORMACK. No. I am not saying that I would vote for it. I say if you are going to give it consideration.

Mr. MICHENER. Yes. Now, Congress cannot pass a law stopping it. Congress has not passed a law providing for it, but Congress has jurisdiction to act in each case presented. The committees in both House and Senate, to which this type of legislation is referred, have established the policy that they will not report favorably matters of this kind. Of course, if a bill came from the Committee on the Disposition of Useless Papers and it got on the floor and was being considered and the Congress enacted it, it would not make any difference which committee it came from; you could not prevent it. That is the position you are in here.

Mr. McCORMACK. Why, in view of the fact that charters have been granted in the past to other schools located in the District of Columbia, and admitting that this school is entitled to favorable consideration, should we refuse to pass this law, thus discriminating against this particular school?

Mr. MICHENER. Two wrongs never make a right.

Mr. McCORMACK. But I am not admitting that there is one wrong, from the gentleman's angle.

Mr. MICHENER. If the gentleman believes in the policy of the Congress of the United States granting a Federal charter to any school asking for it, and giving that school authority to proceed with publications and other things for profit as a Federal corporation, then he and I just disagree on the main fundamentals.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman from Michigan does not correctly state the position of the gentleman from Massachusetts. I have never taken the position that it should be granted to anyone who applies, but where they come before a legislative committee and the legislative committee reports that it is a proper application and that those who are applying for the charter are reputable persons, that this school is a reputable school—in the absence of evidence to the contrary I will support the report of the committee. My friend himself admits that the proponents of the bill are reputable persons.

Mr. MICHENER. Oh, yes; so far as I know, they are.

Mr. McCORMACK. I do not see how we can discriminate against this particular school.

Mr. MICHENER. I do not know anything about the school, but I presume that it is a splendid school.

Mr. RANDOLPH. It is, I may say to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MICHENER. All these schools are; there is no question about that, but that is not the question. I know the gentleman from Massachusetts is a good lawyer, and I have much confidence in his judgment.

Mr. McCORMACK. I thank the gentleman for his confidence, but I cannot plead guilty to being a good lawyer.

Mr. MICHENER. Has the gentleman read this bill?

Mr. McCORMACK. I have read it sufficiently to acquaint myself with its purpose.

Mr. MICHENER. Then, if the gentleman is familiar with the bill, I ask him what it means where the language reads——

Mr. McCORMACK. I did not say I was familiar with it. I said I was sufficiently familiar with it to acquaint myself with its purpose. The gentleman asked me if I had read the bill. I am giving the gentleman an honest answer.

Mr. MICHENER. But the gentleman knows nothing about the details of the bill?

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman from West Virginia is a gentleman in whom I have the utmost confidence. If the Knights of Columbus, of which I happen to be a member, received a charter of this character, I do not see why the Y. M. C. A. should not have one, too. That is the position I take. [Applause.]

Mr. MICHENER. I know there are people who take the view that anybody who wants anything from Congress should have it. I do not belong to that school.

Mr. McCORMACK. That is not my view, however.

Mr. MICHENER. I do not care whether it is the Knights of Columbus, whether it is the Ku Klux Klan, or what it is, I am not going to support a proposition to grant something by Congress when, as a matter of fact, Congress should not grant that thing.

Mr. McCORMACK. If the gentleman feels that Congress should not grant it, the gentleman from the beginning is right; but I disagree with the gentleman. This is perfectly within the prerogatives of Congress, a committee has passed upon it, a committee has held hearings upon it and has reported it out. The gentleman himself says that it is a reputable school. Upon the evidence before me there is only one thing I can do in justice to my conscience, and that is to vote for the bill.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I yield.

Mr. BOILEAU. As I understand, the Congress has already adopted the policy of granting Federal charters to educational institutions in the District of Columbia.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Yes. That was done in the case of Georgetown University, George Washington University, National University, Catholic University, and Columbus University.

Mr. BOILEAU. In view of the fact that Congress has granted charters in the cases mentioned it would be an act of discrimination if they failed to grant a charter in this instance. I feel that we should pass this bill. Another Congress may feel that the policy of Congress should be changed. If they do, they can change it, blanketing all these institutions, including the one now under consideration under the District of Columbia laws and making them comply with the corporation laws of the District of Columbia; but under existing facts and circumstances it would be discrimination not to grant the charter in this instance. For this reason I suggest that we ought to pass this bill. If the gentleman from Michigan wants to change the policy of Congress, that should be done later in a bill having that for its purpose.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I thank the gentleman from Wisconsin. I may say that this really concludes the present picture of the educational situation insofar as they seek Federal charters.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman says this concludes the present picture, but I know two or three more schools that are coming to Congress to ask for Federal charters.

Mr. RANDOLPH. They will have to appear before the proper committee, present their application, and justify it, just as did the others, including Southeastern University.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman who has just spoken indicated plainly that he has not been in touch with this thing. This is not a new matter.

Mr. BOILEAU. I said the policy has been established. I certainly do not think it is a new matter. I admit this has been done before.

Mr. MICHENER. The Congress established the policy and it also did away with the policy until those seeking the privilege sought another committee where they could get favorable consideration.

Mr. BOILEAU. I may say to the gentleman that when Congress has over a period of years granted several of these charters it must have adopted a policy. The Judiciary Committee on which the gentleman serves may have had one policy and the District of Columbia Committee another policy, but after all, in my opinion, either the gentleman's committee or the District of Columbia Committee established the policy of the Congress. In view of the fact the Congress has acted on these matters favorably in the past establishes the policy of the Congress, even if two committees of the Congress may have had different policies.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. I would like to ask the gentleman a question for information and before doing so will make this brief statement. As I understand it this is merely a statute that will authorize this school to become incorporated rather than operate through a board of trustees, and select a board of directors instead of trustees?

Mr. RANDOLPH. They are now operating under the Board of Education of the District of Columbia. This will give them a Federal charter and the board of trustees will come from graduates of the school and others from the Young Men's Christian Association of the District of Columbia.

Mr. MAY. How is the school financed and supported?

Mr. RANDOLPH. The school is financed and supported from tuitions which are paid in. The school has no debt whatsoever. It is a nonprofit institution. A small endowment has been started. High standards have characterized its growth.

Mr. MAY. There is no direct or implied obligation on the part of the Federal Government by reason of this incorporation to account for any funds whatsoever?

Mr. RANDOLPH. None whatsoever.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MICHENER. This bill provides that the certificate of incorporation and certificate of amendment thereto for the incorporation of the Southeastern University of the Young Men's Christian Association of the District of Columbia "under chapter, stating the chapter, be, and the same hereby are, amended and approved." Did the committee have before it the certificate of incorporation referred to in the bill, and which this bill amends and approves, so that it knew what it was approving?

Mr. RANDOLPH. We did. I may say to the gentleman from Michigan it is operating under the District of Columbia Board of Education, as was the situation in the case of other schools who were operating before they were given Federal charters.

Mr. MICHENER. Why does the gentleman approve a existing charter which is not a Federal charter and no make it a part of this bill? In other words, you have some certificate filed in an office in the city of Washington under which the school is operating, and by this bill you are making that certificate, whatever it may be, a law.

My understanding of the committee hearings was that you did not have before you the original certificate or a copy of it, and that you are attempting to amend something which you are told is in a certain office in the District of Columbia, and you are attempting to approve that, whatever it is, and make that document the law. So that if anybody wanted to know what the Federal law was, he would take the Federal statute, but he could not tell unless he went downtown to this office and hunted up a certificate which is there on file. Is that true?

Mr. RANDOLPH. That is true. It is in the District of Columbia.

Mr. MICHENER. It seems to me we should hesitate a long time before passing a statute here that would tell a court who may be passing upon it that it has to go to some city office in order to find out what the law is. You cannot get it in the books. This is the first time, I believe, that the Congress enacted a law solely by reference—excepting the common law, of course.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I may say that the Commissioners of the District of Columbia have favorably reported on such bills.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman's criticism is a minor one. This is all a matter of public record?

Mr. RANDOLPH. It is.

Mr. McCORMACK. If this bill does not refer to it, there is a way to go about getting the information?

Mr. RANDOLPH. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. MICHENER. I have made all the suggestions I care to make. If this bill passes the Senate and is approved in its present form Congress will have authorized a school to grant degrees, and so forth, without a limitation except as provided in a certificate of which the Congress has no knowledge.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I hope the gentleman will not press his opposition further.

Mr. MICHENER. No; I will not press it further; but I want the RECORD to show that the Congress today is passing a bill which, if enacted into law, will approve something that is nowhere to be found in print in the Federal statutes. Any law-enforcing agency attempting to find out what the law is will have to go somewhere in the District of Columbia and hunt up some files in an office in order to know what this committee has approved and made law, not only without reading but even without printing and without the same appearing in the records of this Congress.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I want the RECORD to show that, if we pass this bill today—and I trust the House will—the Congress of the United States establishes no new precedent; we have simply followed that which has been done in the case of other institutions in the District of Columbia which have asked for and been granted Federal charters.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WOODRUM). The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

THE JOINT BOARD AND THE PUBLIC UTILITIES COMMISSION OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the District of Columbia, I call up the bill (H. R. 4803) to provide alternative methods of enforcement of orders, rules, and regulations of the Joint Board and of the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That prosecution for violation of any rule, order, or regulation made, adopted, or approved by the Public Utilities Commission under authority of section 8 of the act approved March 4, 1913 (37 U. S. Stat. L. 974), or amendments thereto, or section 6 (e) of the Traffic Acts, as amended February 27, 1931 (46 U. S. Stat. L. 1424), or section 7 of the act approved July 1, 1902 (32 U. S. Stat. L. 590), as amended by the act approved July 1, 1932 (47 U. S. Stat. L. 550), or by the Joint Board under authority of section 6 (e) of the said Traffic Acts, as amended February 27, 1931, or section 7 of said act approved July 1, 1902, as amended by said act approved July 1, 1932, shall be on information in the Police Court of the District of Columbia, in the name of the District of Columbia, by the corporation counsel or any of his assistants. Any person, corporation, or public utility violating any such rule, order, or regulation shall, upon conviction, be fined not more than $200: Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not be construed to apply to rules, orders, or regulations adopted or promulgated by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia which are not specifically required to be referred to the Joint Board or subject to the approval of such board: Provided further, That with respect to orders, rules, or regulations made or adopted by the Public Utilities Commission under authority of section 8 of the said act approved March 4, 1913, this section shall be construed to apply only to such orders, rules, or regulations as are subject to the penalties specifically provided in paragraph 85 of that act.

SEC. 2. The provisions of section 1 of this act and of paragraph 85 of section 8 of the said act approved March 4, 1913, so far as they relate to the orders, rules, and regulations of the Public Utilities Commission, shall be construed as prescribing alternative methods of enforcement of the orders, rules, or regulations of the Commission, and any order, rule, or regulation adopted by the Public Utilities Commission which is required to be referred to or is subject to the approval of the Joint Board may be enforced either as provided by paragraph 85 of section 8 of the act approved March 4, 1913, or as provided in section 1 of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. HOOK, at the request of Mr. LESINSKI, for 1 week, on account of important business.

To Mr. McCLELLAN, at the request of Mr. MILLER, for 3 days on account of important public business.

To Mr. VINSON of Georgia, indefinitely, on account of important business.

SENATE BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED

Bills and a joint resolution of the Senate of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and, under the rule, referred as follows:

S. 323. An act to extend the provisions of the act entitled "An act for the relief of Indians occupying railroad lands in Arizona, New Mexico, or California", approved March 4, 1913, as extended by the acts of April 11, 1916, June 30, 1919, and March 10, 1928; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

S. 436. An act for the relief of owners of property damaged by high waters in the Blackfoot Reservoir; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

S. 590. An act for the relief of the estate of Grace M. Moore, deceased; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 1590. An act for the relief of Warren J. Fox; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 1631. An act for the relief of Commander William I. Causey, United States Navy, and Lt. Comdr. Earl LeRoy Bailey, Supply Corps, United States Navy; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 1632. An act for the relief of Capt. Benjamin Dutton, Jr., Capt. C. H. J. Keppler, Commander Leo H. Thebaud, and Lt. Comdr. Gordon S. Bower, Supply Corps, United States Navy; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 1721. An act authorizing an appropriation for payment to the Sac and Fox Tribe of Indians in the State of Oklahoma; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

S. J. Res. 56. Joint resolution authorizing the selection of a site and the erection of a pedestal for the Albert Gallatin statue in Washington, D. C.; to the Committee on the Library.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the House of the following titles, which were thereupon signed by the Speaker:

H. R. 1088. An act for the relief of the Baker-Whiteley Coal Co.;

H. R. 1089. An act for the relief of Charles M. Perkins;

H. R. 1091. An act for the relief of Capt. J. H. Merriam, Supply Corps, United States Navy; and

H. R. 1094. An act for the relief of Clark F. Potts and Charles H. Barker.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to an enrolled joint resolution of the Senate of the following title:

S. J. Res. 110. Joint resolution declaring Joseph P. Kennedy eligible for appointment as a member of the United States Maritime Commission.

COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Education may sit during sessions of the House for the remainder of the week.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact the calendar has been called on four Wednesdays this month, that Wednesday of this week will be the fifth Wednesday of the month, and because we desire very much to pass two appropriation bills this week, I ask unanimous consent that business in order on Calendar Wednesday of this week be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

THE LATE BENJAMIN KURTZ FOCHT

Mr. KINZER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make an announcement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. KINZER. Mr. Speaker, with feelings of deep personal sorrow I announce to the membership of the House the sudden and unexpected death on last Saturday evening of our colleague, Hon. BENJAMIN KURTZ FOCHT, late Representative from the Eighteenth Congressional District of Pennsylvania.

Born in New Bloomfield on March 12, 1863, the son of a Lutheran minister, Mr. FOCHT pursued his education in the public schools and later at Bucknell University, Pennsylvania State College, and Susquehanna University, where he became well grounded in fundamental principles of constitutional government and economic development.

He took up journalism and politics as a life work, in both of which he served his people with ability and fidelity.

Ten years he served in the Pennsylvania Assembly and State Senate, and at the time of his death was serving his tenth term as congressional Representative in this body.

At a later date I shall pay a further tribute to his memory.

Mr. Speaker, I now offer the resolution which I send to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 167

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. BENJAMIN K. FOCHT, a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That a committee of four Members of the House with such Members of the Senate as may be joined be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints as members of the committee Mr. HAINES, Mr. GINGERY, Mr. KINZER, and Mr. RICH.

ADJOURNMENT

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the further resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect the House do now adjourn.

The resolution was agreed to; accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Tuesday, March 30, 1937, at 12 o'clock noon.

MOTION TO DISCHARGE COMMITTEE

MARCH 3, 1937.

To the CLERK OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES:

Pursuant to clause 4 of rule XXVII, I, Hon. JOSEPH A. GAVAGAN, move to discharge the Committee on Rules from the consideration of the resolution (H. Res. 125) entitled "A resolution to make H. R. 1507, a bill to assure to persons within the jurisdiction of every State the equal protection of the laws, and to punish the crime of lynching, a special order of business", which was referred to said committee February 19, 1937, in support of which motion the undersigned Members of the House of Representatives affix their signatures, to wit:

Governor of Texas, Austin, Tex.:

Following is submitted for your consideration preliminary report of Dr. David J. Price, principal engineer in charge of Chemical Engineering Division, Bureau of Chemistry and Soils, on investigation made in compliance with your request of the explosion in consolidated school at New London. Dr. Price concludes that during a period of falling barometer the explosion was due to the ignition of an accumulation of gas in open area under first floor of building by flash from electrical equipment in operation of sanding machine located at west side of manual training shop at north end of building. Price recommends the following precautionary measures for prevention of similar occurrences: Requirements for use of effective malodorants for detection of escaping combustible gas due to leaking equipment or other causes. Attention should be given by competent engineers to determination of practical application of combustible gas indicators. Gas-detecting appliances are successfully operating in a number of industries, and engineers should give further attention to adaptation of alarm or other warning systems to schoolhouses and other public buildings. Provision should be made for supervision and inspection of public buildings and installation of all heating and lighting devices. All electrical equipment and appliances should be installed in accordance with requirements of national electrical code. Provision should be made for proper construction of buildings to eliminate dead storage spaces under rooms. Adequate ventilation should be provided for any necessary spaces under buildings. Adequate ventilation should be provided for schoolrooms using gas-heating appliances. Department of Agriculture is very glad to have been of service to you in determining the cause of this explosion which has created Nation-wide concern, and we hope our recommendations will be helpful to you in working out plans for prevention of occurrences of this character. Dr. Price has detailed report in course of preparation; copy will be forwarded as soon as completed.

HENRY A. WALLACE, Secretary.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following memorials of the Senate of the State of Arizona, which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

Memorial relating to the development of war minerals

To the President and the Congress of the United States:

Your memorialist respectfully represents:

According to recent reports a sum approximating $100,000,000 will be appropriated by the Congress for the purpose of purchasing war minerals as a protection to the Nation in the event of war, the statement being made in explanation that at the present time the country is dependent upon foreign sources for such minerals, and in the event of their being cut off by war conditions the Nation's military forces would be restricted to a 30 days' supply.

The fact is well established that in the county of Mohave, particularly, there is available for ready development and use large deposits of manganese, tungsten, and molybdenum, all key minerals needed for military purposes.

On the southern line of Mohave County there is a deposit of manganese approximating 11 miles in length and 5 miles in width, accessible from a paved highway (U. S. Arizona 60) over an unimproved but presently used road which could be quickly improved by a reasonable expenditure.

The development of this road would not only allow the development of the inexhaustible manganese deposit referred to but would render accessible deposits both of molybdenum and tungsten occurring in the same section, all of which would give employment to citizens of our own country.

Wherefore your memorialist, the Senate of the State of Arizona, urgently requests:

1. That through direct legislation or the grant of authority and funds to an appropriate Federal agency provision be made for early improvement of the road into the manganese district of southern Mohave County and development of the war minerals deposited there.

Memorial urging adequate appropriations for the maintenance of civilian conservation camps

To the President and the Congress of the United States:

Your memorialist respectfully represents:

The worth of the movement for the conservation of American manhood known as the Civilian Conservation Corps is well known and almost universally applauded.

Wherever C. C. C. camps have been established in this State the results have been mutually beneficial—the men have profited from their surroundings, the influence exerted by neighboring residents, and their employment, while the communities have been materially benefited by the activities of the men and the improvements in the way of roads, trails, dams, and numerous other works constructed by them.

The abandonment of camps in whatever portion of the State has invariably been a matter of regret.

An instance of this is found in Santa Cruz County, where, in a beautiful canyon of the historic Sonoita River, 3 miles from the town of Patagonia—a section rich in romance and legend—stand the buildings of a well-built camp abandoned by reason of lack of funds.

This camp is in an unusually attractive and interesting district, well watered, timbered, highly mineralized, and possessing an equitable climate. The camp came to be regarded as an institution. Its abandonment is a loss both to the community and to the service.

Wherefore your memorialist, the Senate of the State of Arizona, urgently requests:

1. That adequate provision be made for the continuation of the C. C. C. movement on a scale equal to the absorption of the young men qualified for participation in its benefits.

2. That the camp on the Sonoita, to which reference has been made, be rehabilitated, and that a similar course be followed with respect to all camps as favorably situated as this one.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following memorial of the Senate of the State of Arizona, which was ordered to lie on the table:

Memorial relating to Federal aid for the States for educational programs and purposes

To the President and the Congress of the United States:

Your memorialist respectfully represents:

There is practically unanimous recognition of the principle that in universal education lies the safety of democracy, of the Nation, and of the social and economic welfare of the people.

In order that education may be universal, and that its advantages and opportunities may reach, in appropriate degree, into every section, community, and locality it is obvious that Federal aid to the States is imperative.

It is evident also in order that wise programs of education may be assured of continuity and stability, that definite allotments of Federal funds be made available to the several States.

It is, however, likewise generally recognized as a sound principle that the responsible administration of all educational programs fostered by the Federal Government, which are in any way related to the public schools, should be lodged in the chief administrative department of the State educational system, and the expenditure of Federal funds apportioned in connection with any such program should not be subject to Federal control.

Wherefore your memorialist, the Senate of the State of Arizona, respectfully requests:

1. That the policy of Federal encouragement and fostering of broad educational programs, applicable to all States under conditions which will make for the universality of education, be placed on a permanent basis.

2. That such programs be carried out through the regular educational agencies and authorities of the several States and Federal funds allocated therefor be expended through State channels and in accordance with State laws.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following concurrent memorial of the Legislature of the State of Arizona, which was referred to the Committee on Claims:

Concurrent memorial praying for the relief of certain property owners of Santa Cruz County

To the President and the Congress of the United States:

Your memorialist respectfully represents:

Through the establishment by the United States in 1898 of a 60-foot neutral strip of territory along the boundary between the United States and Mexico, the rights of persons owning property within said area were involved. Particularly were the rights of property owners within that portion of said neutral strip where the same passed through the territory now known as Santa Cruz County, Ariz., affected, inasmuch as the said strip at such location constituted a part of the city of Nogales, and later became what is now known as International Street in the said city of Nogales.

In the course of a determination of the rights of parties owning property within the said area, the Court of Claims of the United States on April 15, 1912, found that the following-named persons were entitled to compensation in the amounts set forth, respectively, for the taking of their property within said neutral strip as it passed through Santa Cruz County: John T. Brickwood, $3,750; Edward Gaynor, $4,250; Theodore Gebler, $1,200; Lee W. Mix, $1,450; Arthur S. Peck, $2,350; Thomas S. Casanega, $500; Joseph D. Lusignan, $3,250; Joseph P. Berger, $1,800.

Despite the fact that said court found said persons entitled to compensation in the amounts above set forth, they have never been compensated for the loss of their property in accordance with the findings of the court, or at all, a failure which appears to constitute a clear violation of the provision of the Constitution of the United States that private property may not be taken for public use without compensating the owner therefor.

Wherefore your memorialist, the Senate of the State of Arizona, the house of representatives concurring, urgently requests:

1. That the Congress of the United States enact the necessary legislation to pay the persons above named the amounts awarded to them by the United States Court of Claims as compensation for the land taken by the United States in the establishment of said neutral strip along the boundary between the United States and Mexico.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Arizona, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Joint memorial on the proposed Argentine Sanitary Convention

To the Senate of the United States:

Your memorialist respectfully represents:

The Argentine Sanitary Convention, now pending before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, would permit the importation of livestock products purported to be free from rinderpest or foot-and-mouth disease.

Under the strict exclusion provisions of the present law importation of such products is prohibited from countries where these diseases exist, and as a result our country is now free from the ravages of these dreaded diseases. There is excellent reason to fear that if the present law is relaxed these diseases would find their way into the United States, to the irreparable injury of the great cattle industry.

Wherefore your memorialist, the Legislature of the State of Arizona, prays:

1. That the Senate of the United States refuse to ratify the proposed Argentine Sanitary Convention.

2. That the present embargo against importation of livestock or the products thereof from countries where either rinderpest or foot-and-mouth disease exists be retained.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Arizona, which was referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining:

Joint memorial on the proposal for a Federal leasing system on mining property

To the Congress of the United States:

Your memorialist respectfully represents:

Recent press reports carry the announcement of a proposal, on the part of the Secretary of the Interior, that the present United States mining laws, under which location and discovery is the basis of the right to develop and to acquire ownership to lode mining claims, be abandoned and a Federal leasing system substituted therefor.

This proposal gives much concern to the States whose mining activities owe their beginnings, and in large part their growth, to the prospector, who, urged by the promise of a rich strike and the right to become the owner of his find, braved the danger and endured the hardships of the hills.

The prospector is still an important, if not an indispensable, factor in the discovery of the mineral treasure stored in western mountains, and will continue, if the incentive for his efforts be not withdrawn, to ply his lonely, arduous, and perilous but effective calling.

The enthusiasm of the adventurous investor also, who risks his fortune on a prospect willingly when he knows that title can be secured to such prospect, would be seriously impaired if not destroyed if a leasing system were substituted, and it is strongly believed that interest in mining development would suffer a most severe blow.

It might be pointed out that under a leasing system the annoyances of long-distance Federal control, the cost of surveying, drawing of leases, and the like would of themselves tend to discourage the transfer of mining claims to those who might be interested in their development, thus retarding the development of this important natural resource; but the principal point is that the promise of rich reward is the lure that is needed to spur the prospector's search and to whet the investor's interest. This incentive would be seriously dulled by the proposed change.

Wherefore your memorialist, the Legislature of the State of Arizona, prays:

1. That the Congress refuse to abandon the plan under which mineral development of the West has progressed satisfactorily, or to change the present laws relating to discovery and location of lode mining claims.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Nevada, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys:

Senate joint resolution memorializing Congress relative to disposition of revenues from oil and gas leases on naval petroleum reserves

Whereas section 35 of the Oil Land Leasing Act of 1920 provides that 52½ percent of all amounts derived by the Federal Government from bonuses, royalties, and rentals on leased oil or gas lands shall be paid into, reserved, and appropriated as a part of the reclamation fund created by act of Congress approved June 17, 1902, and said section also provides that 37½ percent of all amounts so derived shall be paid to the State within the boundaries of which such leased lands are located; and

Whereas this method of distribution of revenues received from oil or gas leases recognizes and establishes the policy that in the use by the United States of a limited and nonrecurring natural resource the area of origin should participate in revenue received therefrom as a measure of compensation for the loss of such natural resource and for the exemption from local taxation which occurs. Nearly all such leases are in the Western States, where water development is a paramount necessity, and in which the Bureau of Reclamation by the construction of water stabilization and control projects is creating new and permanent natural resources; therefore devoting part of such receipts to this purpose is justified, as is the apportioning of a percentage to the States to affect loss of taxable value. This policy is fair and equitable and in the national interest and has been established by the Congress; and

Whereas naval petroleum reserves are created by Executive order of the President from public lands of the United States and leases thereon are made under the provisions of the Oil Land Leasing Act; and

Whereas the total revenues under the Oil Land Leasing Act of 1920 (including leases on naval petroleum reserves) have been approximately $131,000,000, of which more than $32,000,000, or approximately 25 percent of the total revenues, have been from naval petroleum reserves; and

Whereas section 36 of said act provides "that all moneys which may accrue to the United States under the provisions of the act from lands within the naval petroleum reserves shall be deposited in the Treasury as 'miscellaneous receipts' "; and

Whereas if the Bureau of Reclamation had received 52½ percent of the revenues from the lands within naval petroleum reserves up to June 30, 1936, the Bureau of Reclamation would have received an additional $17,114,394.47; and

Whereas the distribution of the revenues from this nonrecurring natural resource to the Bureau of Reclamation to be expended in upbuilding the permanent agricultural resources by making available water for irrigation, hydroelectric power, flood control, improvement of navigation, and other purposes is sound public policy; and

Whereas it is not equitable that the oil reserves for the Navy be obtained in a few States to the material detriment of such States, without affording participation in the revenues from leases in such reserves in line with the fair division recognized and provided for in the Mineral Leasing Act as applying to the public domain; and

Whereas naval petroleum reserves in addition to those now existing may be created at any time, which, under existing law, would deprive the Bureau of Reclamation and the respective States of revenues now being received or which would otherwise be received: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of Nevada, That the Congress of the United States be memorialized to pass appropriate legislation which will provide that of the moneys heretofore or hereafter received from the collection of bonuses, royalties, and rentals under the Oil Land Leasing Act of 1920 within naval petroleum reserves 52½ percent shall be paid into, reserved, and appropriated as a part of the reclamation fund created by the act of Congress known as the Reclamation Act, approved June 7, 1902, and 87½ percent of the amounts received from such bonuses, royalties, and rentals shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury after the expiration of each fiscal year to the State within the boundaries of which the leased lands or deposits are located, said moneys to be used by such State or subdivision thereof for the construction and maintenance of public roads or for the support of public schools or other public educational institutions, as the legislature of the State may direct; and be it further

Resolved, That our Senators in the United States Senate and our Representatives in Congress be requested to use all proper efforts to bring about the passage of the laws covering the matters above referred to; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit properly certified copies of this resolution to the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the House in Congress, and to each of our Senators and our Representative in Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Nevada favoring the enactment of legislation to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to transfer water rights, within Federal projects in States where the State law will permit, from marginal and submarginal lands to good lands, either private or public domain, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Nevada favoring the enactment of legislation to provide for the general welfare by establishing a system of Federal aid to the States for the purpose of enabling them to provide adequate institutional treatment of prisoners and provide improved methods of supervision and administration of probation, parole, and conditional release of offenders, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the board of aldermen of the city of New York, N. Y., favoring the enactment of the so-called Copeland-Curley home mortgage relief bill, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the city commission of Flint, Mich., favoring the enactment of the bill (H. R. 5528) to extend to political subdivisions of States the same treatment accorded to States which borrowed for relief purposes under the Emergency Relief and Construction Act of 1932 by eliminating discrimination in the case of certain loans made to cities and counties under that act, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also laid before the Senate a telegram from Austin Corbin, 2d, and several other citizens of Spokane, Wash., endorsing the telegram in the nature of a memorial from Dr. A. Lawrence Lowell and other citizens of Boston, Mass. (laid before the Senate by the Vice President on the 29th instant), remonstrating against the actions of representatives of certain labor organizations holding possession of property in sit-down strikes, etc., and favoring Executive intervention if Federal legislation is not adapted to meet the situation, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. LODGE presented memorials of sundry citizens of the State of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to enlarge the membership of the Supreme Court, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented resolutions adopted by Petersham Grange, No. 95, Patrons of Husbandry, of Petersham; the Bar Association of Plymouth, and citizens of Lexington, in town meeting assembled, all in the State of Massachusetts, protesting against the enactment of legislation to enlarge the membership of the Supreme Court, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented memorials of directors and members of the First Needlework Guild and also of several citizens, all of Boston, Mass., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to reorganize the judicial branch of the Government, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

TITLE I, FEDERAL HOUSING ACT

Mr. WAGNER presented a petition (in the form of a resolution) signed by sundry citizens of the State of Iowa, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, and the body of the petition was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, without the signatures, as follows:

Whereas that portion of the National Housing Act known as title I will become inoperative on April 1, 1937, unless reinstated by this Congress; and

Whereas it is felt that title I has contributed tremendously to the present recovery of the building industry from the dark depths of depression; and

Whereas the rate of this recovery is dependent upon the rate with which purchasing power and credit is restored to the American people who desire to repair and remodel their homes; and

Whereas the building industry ranks as one of the largest in the Nation in providing employment and purchasing power; and

Whereas title I of the National Housing Act provides credit for repair and remodeling; and

Whereas it is felt that curtailment of purchasing power, credit, and employment would have a highly deleterious effect upon the recovery of the building industry and the Nation; and

Whereas it is believed that to allow title I of the F. H. A. to expire on April 1, 1937, would seriously retard the Nation's recovery; and

Whereas the Congress of the United States of America has the power to extend said title I: Now, therefore,

We the undersigned members and employees of the building industry, do hereby respectfully ask that you take whatever action is necessary to extend the aforementioned title I.

LOW-COST HOUSING

Mr. WAGNER presented resolutions adopted by the Syracuse (N. Y.) Housing Authority and the Grand Street Boys' Association of New York City, which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution adopted by the Syracuse Housing Authority at its meeting on March 9, 1937

Whereas the continued existence of bad housing is detrimental to the physical and moral welfare and are socially undesirable in a community and slums are an economic waste; and

Whereas decent, safe, and sanitary housing for persons of low income cannot be provided through the ordinary channels of private enterprise; and

Whereas it is necessary that the Government provide for and bear a certain portion of the burden of financing the clearance of slums and construction of low-rent housing; and

Whereas the Syracuse Housing Authority, duly established in the city of Syracuse, N. Y., has already made thorough and comprehensive studies and surveys of housing conditions in the city of Syracuse and is prepared to undertake the construction of low-rent housing in certain locations in said city; and

Whereas no funds are available for loans or subsidies for the purposes aforesaid unless Congress makes the necessary appropriation therefor: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Syracuse Housing Authority, of the city of Syracuse, N. Y., hereby endorses and urges the adoption of the United States Housing Act of 1937, being United States Senate bill

4424, introduced by Hon. ROBERT F. WAGNER, Senator from New York, and House of Representatives bill 5033, introduced by Hon. HENRY B. STEAGALL, Representative from Pennsylvania; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to Hon. ROBERT F. WAGNER, United States Senator, and Hon. ROYAL S. COPELAND, United States Senator, from New York, and Hon. CAROLINE O'DAY, Hon. MATTHEW J. MERRITT, and Hon. CLARENCE E. HANCOCK, Representatives from New York.

Whereas the economic, social, and moral well-being of one-third of the people of the United States is endangered by inadequate, unsafe, and unhealthful housing conditions; and

Whereas the Grand Street Boys' Association, collectively, and its 3,000 members, individually, intimately know the dangers and evils of slum life, and believe that unsafe and unhealthful housing impairs the health, disintegrates the moral and intellectual fiber of a community, hampers, if not destroys, the best of our cultural heritage; and

Whereas the urgent need of slum clearance and the housing of low-income wage workers has commended itself to organized labor, philanthropic, religious, and social agencies; and

Whereas those who advocate slum clearance know full well that there can be no adequate solution of the problem of public housing without the adoption of a plan for providing Federal assistance to local housing authorities: And, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, the Grand Street Boys' Association, urge and petition prompt and favorable action on the Wagner-Steagall public housing bill, certain in our judgment that this bill carries the promise of social, economic, and moral progress; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the Honorable ROYAL S. COPELAND, the Honorable ROBERT F. WAGNER, and the Congressmen who represent the city of New York.

HOME-MORTGAGE RELIEF

Mr. WAGNER presented resolutions adopted by the board of aldermen of the city of New York, and the Hollis-St. Albans Civic Association, Inc., of St. Albans, Long Island, in the State of New York, which were referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution memorializing Congress of the United States to act favorably on Senate bill no. 1678 and H. R. no. 4739, relative to providing additional home-mortgage relief within the metropolitan area

Whereas a serious situation has arisen with reference to loans granted by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation to small-home owners in order to enable them to hold their property, by reason of numerous foreclosures and the taking of deficiency judgments by the H. O. L. C. in various parts of our country and more specially in the metropolitan area; and

Whereas a bill has been introduced in the Senate of the United States by Senator ROYAL S. COPELAND, of New York, and in the House of Representatives by Congressman EDWARD W. CURLEY, of New York, known specifically as S. 1678 and H. R. 4739, to provide additional home-mortgage relief by providing for (1) a moratorium on foreclosures permitting appropriate legislation to provide further emergency relief to home-mortgage indebtedness; (2) to further refinance home mortgages; (3) to reduce the rate of interest and extend payment and amortization of mortgages; (4) to eliminate personal and deficiency judgments in foreclosures; and for other purposes: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Congress of the United States be, and hereby is, memorialized to act favorably on S. 1678 and H. R. 4739 to accomplish the purposes set forth above; and

Resolved, That a copy of this memorial be transmitted to the Clerk of the House of Representatives and the Secretary of the Senate, and to each Member of the House of Representatives and to each Senator elected from New York State.

The Hollis-St. Albans Civic Association, Inc., in meeting assembled, hereby goes on record as favoring an extension of all H. O. L. C. mortgages for an additional period of 5 years in order to equalize the burden of payments of home owners over a long period of time, and in order to bring the policy of the H. O. L. C. in line with more liberal policy of the F. H. A., which issues mortgages for a period of 20 years.

Whereas the present rates of interest on H. O. L. C. mortgages is so burdensome that there is much distress, that a great many home owners will be unable to continue their payments;

Whereas the interest of the small-home owner should be of great concern to the Congress: be it

Resolved, That the Hollis-St. Albans Civic Association, Inc., in meeting assembled, go on record as urging our duly elected representatives to the Congress to take steps tending toward a reduction of the rates on H. O. L. C. mortgages to 3 percent.

FEDERAL BUILDING AT KINGS PARK, N. Y.

Mr. WAGNER presented a resolution adopted by members of the fire department of the village of Kings Park, Long Island, N. Y., which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the members of the fire department of the village of Kings Park at a recently convened meeting have sensed the general and growing feeling of dissatisfaction among the resident taxpayers and the visiting public in our community at the total inadequacy of the building that houses our present post office and also of the facilities for handling the postal business of the residents of Kings Park with the degree of comfort and convenience that is offered in a Government-owned building; and

Whereas it is now necessary for all of the residents, including children, to pass over a dangerous and unprotected railroad crossing to reach the present post office, which is located outside the village proper, and this fact alone we believe to be against the policy of the Post Office Department; and

Whereas the village of Kings Park is a fast-growing community, having more than doubled its population in the last decade, and the increase of the business of this town has taken on a wider and broader front, having one of the largest State hospitals for the insane in the country located here, having one of the largest State parks in the New York State park system located here, having our local community organizations taking on an increase in membership, having one of the largest schools on Long Island here in our midst, we of the fire department feel that at this time there is a fast-growing need for an increase in the postal facilities of our town; and

Whereas the Post Office Department of our Government has during the past 4 years been erecting Government-owned buildings to house the post offices in the various towns and villages near our community; and

Whereas the Kings Park fire department of the village of Kings Park, having discussed this matter in a very thorough way, has adopted the following resolution and has ordered a copy sent the following members who make up our representation to our Government at the city of Washington: The Honorable James A. Farley, Postmaster General; Hon. Robert Wagner, United States Senator; Hon. Royal S. Copeland, United States Senator; and to the Honorable Robert L. Bacon, Member of Congress: Be it

Resolved, That the fire department of the village of Kings Park has gone on record as favoring a new and Government-owned building in the village of Kings Park to house our post-office requirements, and that this building be planned, built, and located at some centrally located point in our community; and we do earnestly and respectfully ask that the Post Office Department do earnestly and favorably consider this petition for this most worthy and urgent cause and improvement to this very well-known and fast-growing village of Kings Park, in the State of New York.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. HAYDEN, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 77) for payment of compensation to persons serving as postmaster at third- and fourth-class post offices, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 263) thereon.

A bill (S. 2030) granting a pension to Georgia A. Tinney; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 2031) to amend the act entitled "An act to amend and consolidate the acts respecting copyright", approved March 4, 1909, as amended, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. NYE:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 120) to prohibit the shipment of arms, ammunition, and implements of war from any place in the United States; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

HOUSE BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED

The following bills and joint resolution were severally read twice by their titles and referred, or ordered to be placed on the calendar, as indicated below:

H. R. 3406. An act for the relief of the Southeastern University of the Young Men's Christian Association of the District of Columbia;

H. R. 4803. An act to provide alternative methods of enforcement of orders, rules, and regulations of the Joint Board and of the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia; and

H. R. 5896. An act to provide for the prevention of blindness in infants born in the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

H. J. Res. 226. Joint resolution to amend section 7 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations to provide for the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes", approved July 1, 1902, as amended; to the calendar.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, the bill (H. R. 5299) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to exchange certain lands and water rights in Inyo and Mono Counties, Calif., with the city of Los Angeles, and for other purposes, was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys. I ask that the bill be withdrawn from that committee and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, there being a similar Senate bill pending before that committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PRIORITY OF AMENDMENTS REPORTED BY A COMMITTEE

Mr. NEELY submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 107), which was referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That rule XVIII of the Standing Rules of the Senate be, and the same is hereby, amended by inserting before the first line therein the following new paragraph:

"Amendments reported by a committee shall, unless otherwise ordered, have priority of consideration over amendments proposed from the floor."

REORGANIZATION OF FEDERAL JUDICIARY—ADDRESS BY SENATOR GLASS

[Mr. BYRD asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a radio address on the subject of the President's proposal to reorganize the judiciary, delivered by Senator GLASS on Monday evening, Mar. 29, 1937, which appears in the Appendix.]

REORGANIZATION OF FEDERAL JUDICIARY—EDITORIAL FROM ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

[Mr. WHEELER asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of Wednesday, Mar. 24, 1937, entitled "The Hour and the Man", which appears in the Appendix.]

CROP INSURANCE

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill (S. 1397) to create a Federal Crop Insurance Corporation, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho desire to request that the amendments of the committee be considered prior to the amendments offered by individual Senators from the floor?

Mr. POPE. I do, but I desire to make some further explanation of the bill before the amendments are taken up for consideration.

Mr. President, on last Thursday I discussed generally Senate bill 1397 and attempted to point out its essential features. I think it would be well this morning very briefly to point out the specific provisions of the bill, and then I desire to submit certain data in further answer to questions which were asked during my discussion on Thursday.

The first section states the general purposes of the proposed act; and section 2 creates an agency in the form of a corporation. In section 3 there is provision for $100,000,000 capital stock of the corporation.

In section 3 (b) there is a provision authorizing an appropriation of $100,000,000. I pointed out on Thursday that this does not mean an outright appropriation and use of a hundred million dollars. It simply creates a reserve fund so that in case, during the first few years of operation of the corporation, there should be one or more serious crop failures and, as a consequence, the indemnities would be greater than the premiums this reserve would be available for the purpose of paying the indemnities.

I also call attention to the fact that in the creation of the war-risk insurance during the World War an appropriation of $50,000 was made for a similar reserve. Under the operation of that act, however, no part of the $50,000 was ever used. No part of this $100,000,000 will be used if there is a normal production of wheat in the country, so that the premiums will take care of the indemnities to be paid; and, of course, if there is a year with a large yield it is expected that the reserve will accumulate, that the excess of premiums over indemnities will build up the reserve, and in the event of the use of any portion of this money during the first year or two and there are good years following, the money so used may be replaced by the accumulation of reserves. So this hundred million dollars is simply placed there to protect the operation of the proposed law in case of one, two, or three serious crop failures at the very beginning of the operation of the law.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. POPE. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Is the Senator sure that the bill makes it entirely plain that if any of the cash reserve is used it may subsequently be reimbursed in the good years?

Mr. POPE. No; I am not entirely sure that the wording will cover that point, but it is the intention to do so.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator agrees that it should do so?

Mr. POPE. Yes. The bill provides very strict limitations upon the sale or disposition of the wheat that is accumulated. If, however, it is thought, upon a careful reading of the bill, that the power is not given to replace any portion of the money that is used, I shall have no objection to an amendment to make that clear.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President——

Mr. POPE. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. MALONEY. I wonder if the Senator would object to my propounding an inquiry at this point?

Mr. POPE. Certainly not.

Mr. MALONEY. I am sorry I did not have a chance to talk with the Senator sooner, as I had intended to do. I was detained from the Senate by illness. I had an opportunity, however, to read the Senator's very illuminating and interesting address and discussion of the subject.

In view of the unusual set-up and difference between the proposed plan and regular insurance practices, may I inquire if anyone appeared before the Senator's committee to suggest another name than "insurance" in this connection, or if the Senator himself has given any thought to such a suggestion? It is not insurance in the way we usually understand the term. The Government is asked to set up a fund of $100,000,000 to indemnify the farmers and an additional $10,000,000 for operation of the corporation. I am wondering if it would not be more appropriate to call it "crop security" or "crop stabilization" or "crop equalization" corporation and plan? Has the Senator given any thought to that point?

Mr. POPE. The Senator from Connecticut mentioned that matter to me a few days ago. I am inclined to think that the committee prefers to have the name remain as it is because the bill contains a distinct insurance feature. It is our desire to carry out that feature so far as possible. The term "crop insurance" is known throughout the country. It has now a rather definite meaning, and I can see no advantage in abandoning the term "insurance." It has connected with it the word "crop" and the word "Federal", so it is very clearly distinguished from any private insurance company.

Mr. MALONEY. In his first address on the subject the Senator very ably expressed the aim of those who have drawn the bill, which is to bring security to the farmers. Of course the Senator understands in part my interest. I come from a State where insurance is a large business. I am concerned with the insurance companies and the thousands of agents they have over the country. I am opposed to the Government entering the insurance business. I am opposed generally to the Government getting into any kind of business. I am inclined to think this plan will work a hardship on the insurance companies. It will mislead the people of the country, because it is not really insurance in the sense that insurance is generally understood or as we have come to recognize insurance over the years.

The plan is just what the Senator said originally—a security plan for the farmers. It seems to me more appropriate that it should be called just what it is—crop security or crop stabilization or crop equalization.

I realize that I should have presented this matter to the subcommittee, as the Senator knows it was my intention to do, but circumstances over which I had no control made it impossible for me to do so.

Mr. BILBO. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. POPE. I yield.

Mr. BILBO. The Senator said that his State has hundreds of insurance companies. Do any of those companies accept this kind of insurance for farmers?

Mr. MALONEY. The Senator misunderstood me. I did not say we have hundreds of insurance companies in Connecticut. I was talking for all insurance companies and not alone those in Connecticut.

Mr. BILBO. Of course, the Senator knows that those insurance companies cannot give the farmers all the kinds of crop insurance they desire.

Mr. MALONEY. The insurance companies to which I have referred have many hundreds of millions of dollars invested. I do not know just how much they have invested, but they have written some forms of insurance that are proposed to be taken care of under the provisions of the bill now before us.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield?

Mr. POPE. Certainly.

Mr. TYDINGS. May I answer further the question of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BILBO] by stating that in a conversation last fall one of the very highest Government officials—I do not like to mention his name—stated that on one or two occasions on a farm down south, I think in the State of Georgia, he had applied for and secured crop insurance from an insurance company, and that that company had had to take a loss on each of the occasions when he had placed the insurance with that company. There are companies writing crop insurance, and the person I have in mind had applied for and received that kind of insurance, and the return in the case mentioned was much greater to the insured than the premium which he paid.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, if the Senator from Idaho will permit me——

Mr. POPE. Certainly.

Mr. MALONEY. I should like to add to what I said in answer to the Senator from Mississippi. Of course, the Senator from Mississippi will understand that insurance companies cannot be quite so generous with their stockholders' or their policyholders' money as the Federal Government is here asked to be, and oftentimes is, in times of stress. It is an unusual thing that we are asked to do. We are asked to be out $100,000,000 of the taxpayers' money to start the plan. A private insurance company cannot undertake to do that sort of thing.

It is because of the difference between the Government as an insurer and a private insurance company as an insurer that I am wondering if we cannot give the insurance companies and the stockholders and policyholders of the insurance companies and the agents representing the insurance companies the kind of protection to which I think they are entitled under the terms of the bill.

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, I have no serious objection to the suggested change of name. It would not vary the terms of the bill nor would it vary the administration of the provisions of the bill. I think it would have no effect upon its ultimate success or failure. However, it seems to me so perfectly clear that this form of proposed insurance is distinguished from private insurance ventures that there could be no possible disadvantage to any private insurance company.

Mr. MALONEY. I thank the Senator very much for the statement he has made. I shall offer my amendment at the proper time.

Mr. BARKLEY and Mr. McGILL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. POPE. I yield first to the Senator from Kentucky, and then I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BARKLEY. I wish to ask the Senator from Connecticut and also the Senator from Maryland whether the kind of insurance to which reference was made a while ago is insurance on the crop after it has been housed, which is one kind of insurance, or whether it is insurance of the crop in the field. There may be companies which go into the field and guarantee a farmer against drought or hail or some other form of devastation. I do not happen to know of any such company, but there is a difference, as the Senator will readily realize, between insuring a farmer against loss of his crop because of drought or some other catastrophe and insuring the crop after he has housed it in a barn or warehouse.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield?

Mr. POPE. Certainly.

Mr. MALONEY. My answer to the Senator from Kentucky is that I have reference to crops in the field. I do not know how extended that form of insurance is; but in Connecticut, where tobacco is raised, the tobacco farmer regularly, at least until recently, has protected himself against hail by hail insurance.

Mr. BARKLEY. I think it is true that there are companies which insure a farmer against hail, which is especially damaging to tobacco because it destroys and cuts the leaves. Whether there are insurance companies which would insure him against failure of crop by reason of any natural cause such as drought, I do not know.

Mr. MALONEY. I do not believe it is done very extensively if at all. I do not believe the insurance companies would welcome the idea of such an unusual risk.

Mr. McGILL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield to me for a brief statement?

Mr. POPE. Certainly.

Mr. McGILL. I note that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] has left the Chamber temporarily. I wish an opportunity might have been afforded to inquire of him with reference to the type of insurance he was discussing. I think it must have been in line with that which the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MALONEY] has in mind, that is, insurance by a private company against the loss of a crop because of hail or by reason of some other casualty, the policy being written to insure so much per acre in a monetary sense, so many dollars per acre, and the indemnities being based on a percentage of the loss of the crop. I think the kind of insurance provided in the bill is not to be compared in any way with that type of insurance. It is in nowise similar. I know of no private corporation which has ever issued policies of insurance such as are provided in the measure now before us.

Due to the fact that the farmers generally throughout the country, over a long period of years, have been discussing this particular kind of insurance and that it has come to be known to them as "insurance", I think it would be very inadvisable to change the bill in respect to the term used to designate it. I do not think it interferes in any way with private insurance concerns. It is true that many mutual hail insurance companies have failed; but their program and their policy were entirely different from the program and policy contemplated by the measure which is before the Senate.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield to me for a moment longer?

Mr. POPE. I yield again, briefly.

Mr. MALONEY. I merely wish to make a brief observation to the Senator from Kansas.

I am in sympathy with what this bill is intended to do. I congratulate the Senator from Idaho and the members of his committee and those who assisted them for what appears to me to be an admirable bill. I think—and the Senator from Idaho has agreed with me—that the plan would not be harmed in the least by the change of name. The point has been stressed that the bill is intended to give security to the farmer, to give equalization to crops. I think it ought to be properly entitled, and that we ought not to seem to put the Government or the Department into the insurance business when it is not the intention to do so.

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, I appreciate the interest of the Senator from Connecticut and his very fair statement in the matter. If I could see any disadvantage or any harm to private insurance companies which might result from the use of the term "insurance" in this connection, I should agree with the Senator without a moment's hesitation; but I can see no possible disadvantage to the private insurance companies, because even their method of doing business heretofore has been different from this method. Private insurance companies have sought to insure not only the yields but the prices of commodities, and their efforts generally have been ineffective. Very few are engaged in this sort of insurance. So far as I know, none is engaged in this particular type of all-risk insurance.

Mr. McGILL. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to make a suggestion there?

Mr. POPE. Just one minute. So it seems to me there could be no possible disadvantage to private insurance companies by reason of the enactment of this bill so far as the name is concerned.

Mr. MALONEY. There would not be under this bill, but there might be under the next one.

Mr. McNARY and Mr. McGILL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. POPE. I yield first to the Senator from Oregon, who first rose.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I share the hope of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MALONEY] that this bill will not project the Government permanently into the insurance business. I think I assisted in pioneering along this line about 15 years ago and made a similar statement in the committee at that time, and it is contained in the RECORD.

There are no private companies at present carrying this form of insurance. In my opinion, there are no companies carrying any form of crop insurance that would object to this experiment. It is my hope and my sincere belief that if this experiment proves to be practicable, the Government will go out of the business and private and mutual insurance companies will take up this line of business and will extend the insurance to cover all the basic agricultural commodities.

A little later I may discuss that subject somewhat more in detail.

Inasmuch as the Senator from Idaho has yielded to me, I desire to ask him a question. There is one provision in the bill which I do not quite understand, namely, the one regarding the corporation created in the Department of Agriculture, with a capital stock, subscribed by the Government, of $100,000,000. Will the Senator in some detail specify, as best he can, what will be the status of the $100,000,000 when indemnities are paid on account of losses? Will the $100,000,000 be touched? Is its condition static? Is it mobile? Can it be dissipated? Can Congress be expected to contribute any sums that may accrue as losses?

I should like to have the Senator discuss that subject matter, which was brought into the debate a moment ago by the able Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] in the question he propounded to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, it is the purpose of the bill to have Congress authorize an appropriation in the bill, and to make the appropriation available at such future time as Congress may decide.

As I have several times pointed out, if there is a normal production of wheat there will be no necessity to draw upon the appropriation of $100,000,000 which has been authorized, or if there is a large yield of wheat it will not be drawn upon. Only in the event that the claims for indemnity exceed the amount of wheat that may be on hand or in reserve, making it necessary for the Government to pay claims, will it be necessary to draw upon this appropriation to that extent.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question at that point?

Mr. POPE. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Will the Senator indicate to me the section of the bill which authorizes the use of the corporation's capital to pay losses? I cannot find it.

Mr. POPE. I cannot answer the Senator now. It has been our understanding all the time that that is authorized. It may be that the Senator is right that there is no specific provision in the bill making that authorization. I do not now recall such a specific provision. I know, however, that that was intended; and it may be that the bill would require an amendment to authorize it.

Mr. VANDENBERG. If, as the Senator indicated a few moments ago, it is the purpose of the bill to reimburse the fund out of subsequent surpluses, it is impossible to assure that protection except as we can locate the initial power to draw upon the fund; and if the bill lacks all specification regarding the payment of losses out of the $100,000,000, I think the bill would fail to do what the Senator says it is intended to do.

Mr. POPE. I shall be glad to consider and discuss that subject when I have more time; and if an amendment is required to accomplish that purpose, I myself shall be very glad to offer it.

Mr. McNARY and Mr. RUSSELL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. POPE. I yield first to the Senator from Oregon, who first rose.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I repeat that the inquiry of the Senator from Michigan is pertinent. The bill proceeds upon the theory that the payments of premiums will take care of the indemnities; that there will be a complete absorption of one by the other. Confessedly, the $100,000,000 authorized to be appropriated is a fund to be available whenever losses or indemnities exceed the amount of premiums paid; but there is nothing in the bill which indicates that the $100,000,000 is to be used for that purpose, and there ought to be something to that effect in the measure. Otherwise, it appears to me from reading the bill, as I had occasion to do yesterday, that the $100,000,000 is to be subscribed by the Government to the corporation in the Department of Agriculture without any use to be made of the $100,000,000.

Mr. POPE. I call the Senator's attention at that point to the language of section 3 (a), which, with the approval of the Secretary, authorizes the payment of this amount in whole or in part to the board of directors of the corporation; so there is authority for paying it to the board of directors of the corporation. I admit, however, that no specific authority is given to the board of directors to use the fund in paying indemnities when necessary.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. POPE. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. It seems to me that subsections (i) and (j), on page 5, probably are broad enough to cover that. In enumerating the powers of the corporation, subsections (i) and (j) provide that it—

> (i) Shall determine the character and necessity for its expenditures under this act and the manner in which they shall be incurred, allowed, and paid, without regard to the provisions of any other laws governing the expenditure of public funds and such determinations shall be final and conclusive upon all other officers of the Government; and
> (j) Shall have such powers as may be necessary or appropriate for the exercise of the powers herein specifically conferred upon the Corporation and all such incidental powers as are customary in corporations generally.

Any insurance company privately organized, of course, would have the power to use its capital if it was necessary to use it in order to pay losses. While the language I have read is not a specific authorization for that purpose, it seems to me it is sufficiently general to authorize the board of directors to do that.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield in order to permit me to ask the Senator from Kentucky a question?

Mr. POPE. Yes; I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Conceding for the sake of the argument that subsections (i) and (j) might authorize the use of the fund to pay losses, does the Senator from Kentucky find anything in subsections (i) or (j) which would assure the reimbursement of the Government's cash fund from subsequent surplus crop years?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; there is nothing in those subsections which refers to that subject; but the Corporation would be entitled, I think, as a matter of law, to use any surpluses they had out of premiums that were collected over a period of years to reimburse the capital stock, just as any private corporation would be able to do the same thing.

Mr. VANDENBERG. But does not the Senator think the requirement for reimbursement should be part of the statute?

Mr. BARKLEY. It may be that there is something in that point. I think undoubtedly the corporation would have authority to do it. Whether or not it ought to be mandatory upon them may be a question for consideration.

Mr. RUSSELL and Mr. TYDINGS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. POPE. I yield first to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, the bill presented by the Senator and all the discussion revolve wholly about the wheat farmer. Of course, the producers of cotton and tobacco in this country are subject to all the ravages of insects and the vicissitudes of nature. I should like to ask the Senator what consideration was given by the committee to permitting the cotton farmers—who, incidentally, have benefited less from the farm program than any other class of farmers in the Nation—to share in the benefits of this plan.

Mr. POPE. Very careful consideration was given to the matter of other commodities than wheat. Cotton, corn, tobacco, and some other commodities were discussed by the committee; but the fact is, as I indicated in my speech the other day, that the Department has not gathered sufficient data with which to arrive at the premiums which would be necessary or correct in case cotton or corn or other commodities were included in the bill. It was estimated that it would take them probably a year to accumulate these data. They are going ahead with the work now.

I have here a statement, furnished me by the Department, that there are 228 cotton counties the data from which have been worked over; but there are data from many other counties which ought to be worked over. The statement was made that it would take them probably a year to obtain the necessary data with which to arrive at sound premiums from an actuarial standpoint.

Mr. RUSSELL. Does the Senator know how long the Department has been engaged in collecting the figures necessary to enable them to assist us in making calculations as to wheat?

Mr. POPE. Just about a year. They began the work in January or February 1936. They have been working on other data than as to wheat, but during the last several months they have given their time exclusively to wheat.

With reference to cotton there is also a problem as to the payment of premiums in kind. Since cotton is baled, and there are many two- or three-bale farmers, there is a problem which will have to be worked out with reference to the payment of the premiums. Whether some arrangement can be made that they will be paid in seed cotton or cottonseed, or some pooling arrangement can be made, all will have to be worked out.

The Secretary of Agriculture stated in his testimony on the bill that it is the hope that no other commodities would be added to wheat, because it seems that with the data we have a wheat program can be put into effect with a very great possibility of success; but it is experimental, and therefore it seems wise not to experiment with too many commodities to begin with. As I stated, the data have not been obtained with which to work out a program as to cotton.

Mr. RUSSELL. The bill provides for the expenditure of a very large sum of money by the National Treasury for the benefit of one class of farmers. I heartily approve of the basic principle of the bill, but I must express the hope that the Department of Agriculture will earnestly address itself to the question of securing the information necessary to enable cotton farmers to share in the benefits of legislation of this kind.

The cotton farmers are the lowest-income group in the entire Nation, and it seems that in the administration of the affairs of the Department of Agriculture it is necessary on all occasions for the cotton farmers to wait until other classes of farmers have been reached and benefited before they may share in the benefits of Federal legislation.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield?

Mr. POPE. Let me make one statement with reference to the observation of the Senator from Georgia.

It is my belief that all the staple commodities should eventually be included in this program. Certainly cotton, corn, and tobacco should be included, if the experience in carrying out the law as to wheat should demonstrate that the experiment was not successful. Otherwise it might be that the cotton farmers would not desire to be included.

Mr. RUSSELL. Even in the event of failure of the plan, the wheat farmers stand an excellent chance to benefit to the extent of a hundred million dollars out of the National Treasury.

Mr. POPE. I do not think that is a fair statement, because no part of the $100,000,000 could be used if there were normal wheat production throughout the country.

Mr. RUSSELL. I understand that.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHAVEZ in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. POPE. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I should like to invite the Senator's attention to page 3, section 5, subsection (c), where the board is empowered to "make contracts and purchase or lease and hold such real and personal property as it deems necessary." Does the Senator know whether or not it is contemplated that the board will actually buy or lease any of the wheatlands in question?

Mr. POPE. It is not the intention to lease or buy any wheatlands at all. This is merely a general provision giving power to the board to rent or lease office space or warehouse space, or do any of those things which are necessary in the actual operation of the corporation.

Mr. TYDINGS. I assumed that was the idea, and I suggest to the Senator that it would be well to insert language which would allow the board to do what it desires to do, and yet prohibit it from going into the business of buying or selling wheatlands, at least at this juncture of the experiment.

May I also ask the Senator whether on page 5, subsection (i), the language has been so drawn as not to require approval of the expenditures of the board by the Comptroller General?

Mr. POPE. It has been; but the Senator will note that in another part of the bill there is provision for complete accounting to the Comptroller General and the General Accounting Office, and a report by the General Accounting Office to Congress.

Mr. TYDINGS. In other words, the Comptroller General, as I understand, is to make his survey of the expenditures after the expenditures are made?

Mr. POPE. Yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. And he is not to do with respect to this agency what he does with respect to the other agencies of the Government, namely, give contemporary approval as a requisite to the expenditure of money?

Mr. POPE. That is correct. Power is given to the board to determine the nature and character of the expenditures, and recognize and approve claims and pay them promptly.

Mr. TYDINGS. I should like to invite the Senator's attention to page 7, section 7, subsection (a), where the things which may happen to the wheat crop are defined.

Mr. POPE. Yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. For instance, "unavoidable causes including drought, flood, hail, wind, winterkill, lightning, tornado, insect infestation, plant disease, and such other causes as may be determined by the board." I think it would be wise if such things as are to be insured against were enumerated in the bill, and the responsibility of the board were fixed as to those particular things. Drought, floods, plant diseases, and things of that kind are the matters contemplated to be insured against, but the words "and such other causes as may be determined by the board" may lead the board, probably not directly but indirectly, to embark in some fields which may, if they are carried too far, reflect discredit upon the entire scheme. I suggest to the Senator that that language be stricken out, and that a strong definition, broad enough to comprehend the matter, be inserted in its place.

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, the suggestion of the Senator brings up a point that was discussed by the committee and by many of the witnesses at the hearing. There are a number of causes which may or may not be unavoidable; for instance, forest fires, or fires caused by sparks from railway engines, or damages done by animals due to the negligence of someone else. There is provision in the bill, by the way, as to negligence or malfeasance on the part of the insured. So that there may be in one section a hazard which ought to be insured against and which in another section should not be insured against. There are avoidable and unavoidable features in connection with certain hazards; and since this is intended to be an all-risk insurance plan, under which indemnities are to be paid only when the crop falls below the coverage, which is a certain percentage of the average yield, we did not feel capable of specifying every particular unavoidable cause which under all circumstances ought to be insured against.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I appreciate the point the Senator has made. It seems to me that if the wording, "unavoidable causes", is included in the paragraph, it is not necessary to say "and such other causes as may be determined by the board." I make the observation because I should like to point out to the Senator that the bill really is an insurance policy. That is exactly what it is. It tells the farmer what he is to be insured against. In every insurance policy companies have found it wise to specify exactly the risk they are undertaking to write.

I am not offering this suggestion in criticism; I think the bill will be stronger if with a certain amount of elasticity, which ought to be permitted, such unavoidable causes and every other cause be directly specified. The language, "and such other causes as may be determined by the board", is so broad that it might cause a great many difficulties when farmers undertake to insure their crops and to settle for their crops.

I think the bill would be much stronger, and, in the nature of an experiment, would be a better experiment, if in the bill we told the farmers exactly what they were being insured against. But to leave it to "any other causes", to be worked out by the Department, may cause us to regret the experiment later on.

In this connection, and in conclusion, let me say to the Senator that a great many people believe the Federal farm board failed because the board could do almost anything it desired to do, and in the end it pursued an erroneous policy, costing the Government a large sum of money, without any great compensation to the farmers who were supposed to be benefited.

Mr. POPE. I might say to the Senator that in the discussion Thursday I covered quite as fully as I could the farm board feature, and the reserve feature of this bill as compared to the farm board operation, and I think I drew a clear distinction between the two.

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me suggest to the Senator that the words "unavoidable causes", together with the definitions that follow, seem to me to be sufficient to give the corporation all the authority it ought to have. I believe that the words "and such other causes as may be determined by the board" provide a latitude that may bring the experiment into the realm of failure.

Mr. POPE. While, of course, the suggestion will be considered, I wish to say that the words "such other causes" were interpreted to mean such other similar causes as are specified, and it was the opinion of the lawyers in the committee that that would be the result.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not think it would be wise to strike out the language on page 8, "and such other causes." If that is stricken out, then, of course, the insurability is limited to the causes named on the previous page, and, no matter how unavoidable some other form of damage might be, it could not be insured against under that limitation of language. But if it is intended that the language on page 8 be interpreted to mean other similar or like causes, it strikes me that the word "unavoidable" ought to be inserted between "other" and "causes", so the language would be "such other unavoidable causes as may be determined by the board."

Mr. TYDINGS. I think the suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky would meet the objection I raised. The insertion of the word "unavoidable" would keep insurance limited to unavoidable causes, but if that word were not inserted the board could insure for any cause.

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that the committee will consider the suggestion and determine later if the insertion of that word accomplishes the purpose desired, because I see there is no difference of opinion in our minds as to what ought to be covered.

Mr. BARKLEY. Inasmuch as the words "unavoidable causes" are used, followed by the inclusion of a number of causes, and the word "unavoidable" is not used in the later general blanket language, it might be determined that the Board could insure for any cause, however avoidable it might have been. I think that the addition of the word "unavoidable" would cure that fault.

Mr. McGILL. Mr. President, I agree with what the Senator from Kentucky has said, that the amendment can be made on page 8, line 1; but I do not concur in what the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] has said, that, unless the amendment were made, the board could insure for any cause, because it is my conclusion that the general language following the specific terms set forth in the bill would be construed by a court to relate back to those things specifically named, and that it simply means causes of like character to those named in the measure. I can see no objection to the emandment suggested, but I wish to say, in connection with what I have said as to the construction of that language, that the committee discussed it with the attorney who drafted this measure and he placed the construction on the general clause following the specific clauses that I have stated here to be my idea as to what the rule of construction should be.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. POPE. I yield.

Mr. NEELY. Will the distinguished Senator from Idaho please lend his attention to a letter from one of my constituents, a part of which is as follows?—

We orchardists are particularly interested in hail insurance. At present the insurance companies charge 10 percent for hail insurance and we cannot collect anything until we have at least a 10-percent loss. This makes about 11 percent, which is about all the profit there is in orchard crops.

I am sure the orchard people all over our State will be pleased if you will use your influence to have hail insurance covering fruit included in this measure.

Senate bill 1397.

If the Government could insure our crops for hail on something like 4 or 5 percent, I am sure it will meet with hearty approval from all our growers as the present rates are practically prohibitive.

Does the Senator from Idaho know any reason why the bill should not be amended so as to include insurance of apples and other fruits against damage by hail and storm?

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator that my first thought with reference to this bill grew out of a disaster in my own State which occurred in October 1935, I believe, when practically all the fruit on the trees was destroyed, the potatoes in the ground were destroyed, and we had the worst freeze that we had had in 40 years. That disaster to our fruit growers caused me to think about the situation.

However, with reference to this program there are several reasons why at this time it would not be helpful to include fruit under the provisions of the bill. In the first place there is attached to the insurance protective feature the ever-normal-granary idea of storing these reserves. In view of the fact that fruit is a perishable product, it can readily be seen that it would not lend itself to this sort of program. Something else must be worked out in order to have a practical policy for taking care of fruit producers. Either this storage idea would have to be abandoned and some provision made for the payment of their premiums in cash, or something else would have to be worked out.

The point is that since fruit is a perishable product it does not lend itself to inclusion in this sort of bill. It is my hope that as we go forward in the operation of this proposed law that a program can be worked out as soon as possible for the benefit of the fruit producers, for the reason that in my own State we have exactly the same problem, and I have many letters from our fruit growers raising the same question as presented by the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, if the Senator will further yield, may I inquire if he would accept an amendment which would provide insurance for apples and other fruits?

Mr. POPE. I should object at this time for the reason that it would be perfectly futile to include it in the bill.

Mr. NEELY. Does the Senator think that the inclusion of such an amendment would endanger the passage of the bill.

Mr. POPE. That I would not know. There is no data available to determine what would be a fair premium on fruit. In addition to the other reasons that I have given, no data at all has been accumulated to determine what would be a fair premium to be charged the fruit men. I think that if fruit insurance were included the Department could not put it into operation because it would take some time to work out such a plan. The provisions of this bill would not apply to fruit, anyway. Some other plan must be worked out, it seems to me, outside of this bill in order to cover fruit or other perishable products.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, inasmuch as the Senator has indicated that the fruit growers of his State also desire fruit-crop insurance, will he not later join me in the preparation of a bill designed to supply the wants of the fruit growers in this matter?

Mr. POPE. I shall be very glad to join the Senator in any effort to work out a practical plan for the insurance of fruit after the passage of this bill.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. POPE. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ADAMS. I should like to ask for some information. Am I correct in understanding that the bill contemplates the payment of premiums in cash if desired by the insured farmers?

Mr. POPE. Yes.

Mr. ADAMS. And that the corporation will also have the option of paying the farmer in wheat, if it sees fit, in the event he sustains a loss?

Mr. POPE. It is understood that the insured may, if he desires, have indemnities paid in money which would be of the current value of the wheat to which he would be entitled. That means that the board of directors would have to sell enough wheat to pay him in cash, but it would be at the option of the insured rather than at the option of the corporation.

Mr. ADAMS. May I ask the Senator if the option rests with the insured as to whether he should be paid in cash or in wheat? The bill provides that the premium to be received by the corporation shall be invested in wheat. So that, if there should be a decline in the value of the wheat in which the corporation has invested the premiums, then the corporation stands a very substantial chance of loss. It permits the insured to take advantage of the decline in the price of wheat. As I understand the insurance principle involved, if an acre of land was normally or as a matter of average producing 25 bushels of wheat, and in a given year it only produced 10 bushels, the insurance would cover the difference between the farmer's average production and the actual production, the loss having proved due to some unavoidable cause. But, if there was an average loss to the farmer of 10 bushels of wheat per acre, then the insured could decide whether he would take 10 bushels of wheat or whether he would take cash; and the corporation, having invested the premiums in wheat, having wheat in storage, would be compelled to allow the insured to exercise that option, which would be for his benefit and to the disadvantage of the corporation.

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, I think the Senator misunderstands the plan. The provision is that the board may fix a certain amount of coverage of the average yield. The average yield must be determined in certain ways specified in the law, by considering the average yield to the individual farm along with the average yield to farms in the locality. In that way the average yield is determined, and then a percentage of the average yield will be insured as the insurance coverage—50 or 75 percent, we will say. Then, if by reason of these hazards the yield in a given year falls below the coverage, the difference between the coverage and the actual amount of yield will be the measure of the insured's indemnity. Then when the premiums are paid they are paid in wheat or cash equivalent; that is, the wheat might be turned into cash at the price then current and prevailing, and would be paid to the corporation if the farmer desired to do that. When indemnities are paid they will be paid in wheat, unless the farmer requests the payment of the cash equivalent, and, in the event they are paid in cash, the wheat will be sold and converted into money at the prevailing price at that time and will be turned over to the farmer. In other words, the wheat would be sold and the proceeds turned over to the farmer instead of turning over the wheat and letting him sell it at any time he might choose. So it seems to me there is no disadvantage and no chance of loss to the corporation in that transaction, because, if they pay the indemnities, they will pay them with wheat which has been paid in or convert it at that time into cash and turn over to the farmer the cash, so there will be no chance of loss to the corporation.

Mr. ADAMS. It would seem to me, I will say to the Senator, that there would be a very decided chance of loss. If the Government accepts premiums in the form of wheat at $2 a bushel, or invests the premiums in wheat at $2 a bushel, and there should be a decline in the price of wheat in storage—I am using extreme figures—to a dollar a bushel, then the farmer may say to the Government, "I want money", in the event the wheat goes down, or, "I want wheat", if wheat goes up. The farmer is guaranteed on the basis, as I read the bill, of the average crop loss of wheat on the insured farm. That is, he is protected on a certain acreage production, so that he may figure in terms of wheat for one purpose and then he may figure in terms of dollars on another basis, when wheat may be exchanged or sold.

I do not wish to pursue that, but may I ask the Senator to be good enough to answer a question relative to section 11 on page 11, which reads?—

> When designated for that purpose by the Secretary of the Treasury, the corporation shall be a depository of public money, except receipts from customs, under such regulations as may be prescribed by said Secretary; and it may also be employed as a financial agent of the Government; and it shall perform all such reasonable duties, as a depository of public money and financial agent of the Government, as may be required of it.

Why should an insurance corporation which accepts its premiums in wheat and which may pay losses in wheat be made a depository of public money and a fiscal agent of the Government?

Mr. POPE. To be perfectly frank, the reason that provision is in the bill is that the Supreme Court has held that the Federal land banks which were designated as the depositories of the corporation created were constitutional because of that fact, and, since we have a case directly in point, by making this corporation a depository of the Government if and when the Treasury should decide that that would be proper, in our opinion, it makes this proposed law constitutional.

Mr. ADAMS. Would the Senator say that the measure would not be constitutional unless this insurance corporation were made a fiscal agent of the Government?

Mr. POPE. I will say to the Senator it would be very doubtful whether it would be constitutional. I think there are other grounds upon which to base the constitutionality of the bill. Its constitutionality may be based on the ground of the entry of the wheat into interstate commerce, as undoubtedly it would enter interstate commerce in going from the producer to the Government warehouse and back again. That might be a sufficient element of interstate commerce to enable the bill to be upheld on that ground. Furthermore, the Government has been spending sums of money for the relief of farmers in the way of seed loans and grants of various kinds, such as those for drought relief. While, so far as I know, no test has ever been made, if such laws are constitutional, perhaps this measure would be, because it is designed to assist the farmers in a different form but for the same purpose and effect. So, on several other grounds, I think its constitutionality might be upheld. But on this ground we have a case in the Supreme Court, decided about 1923, which specifically holds that when an agency of the Government or a corporation is made a fiscal agent or depository of public funds, then its constitutionality may be upheld.

Mr. ADAMS. Does the Senator understand that Congress can create any type of corporation, and if it is made a fiscal agent of the Government, then it may be endowed with any sort of function that we please? In other words, there seems to be in the Senator's mind some question as to whether or not we could create a corporation and give it the authority to write crop insurance in and of itself, but when we add to that power an additional power and say that it may be a depository of public money and may act as a financial agent of the Government, then we give to it the power to write crop insurance.

Mr. POPE. I would not say that the Government could create any sort of corporation and make it a fiscal agent; as to that I do not know; but, reading the decision of the Court in the Federal land-bank case, where the present Chief Justice then was of counsel, he urged such a law would be constitutional on the ground of general public welfare. That point, however, was disregarded, and the Court upheld the constitutionality of that act on the narrow ground that the corporation in that case had been designated as a depository of public funds and made a fiscal agent of the Government. Therefore, it seems to me that the purposes and objects of the corporation provided for by this bill are such that it would be safer to make it a fiscal agent and depository of public funds in order to conform to that decision.

Mr. ADAMS. I would not ask anybody, in these days of reluctance to comment upon the courts, what he would think of the reasoning which would make valid an insurance grant of power by the inclusion of some entirely different function.

Mr. POPE. I may say to the Senator that that exact question was raised in the Federal land-bank case; it was there argued by counsel that making the Federal land bank a depository of Federal funds was a mere pretext; and the Court in that case—and that was as far back as 1923—said that the motives of the Congress in making the Federal land bank a Federal depository could not be looked into by the Court; that its motives were beyond the power of the Court. That would seem to answer quite well the question raised by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ADAMS. I am frankly amazed, though, perhaps, I should not be; but, so far as I can see, there is not any connection between section 11 granting the powers of fiscal agent to this corporation and the exercise of the functions which are the purpose of the bill. Of course, if creating these disconnected and severable functions will save the bill, and there is no intention to exercise the functions, I have nothing further to say.

Mr. POPE. That was exactly the argument the counsel made in the Federal Farm Loan Act case, that there was no connection between the Federal land bank and the Federal Government, and therefore it was a pretext; but the Court upheld the power of Congress to enact the statute in that case.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. POPE. I yield.

Mr. PEPPER. Generally, the bill seeks to insure against losses which might be described as natural losses or losses due to natural causes, does it not?

Mr. POPE. Generally, yes.

Mr. PEPPER. In other words, it is not intended to assure against the fluctuation of prices?

Mr. POPE. No.

Mr. PEPPER. If that be the spirit in which the matter is approached, then would not the logical sequence be to afford insurance first to those crops with respect to which the natural hazard is the greater?

Mr. POPE. I admit that.

Mr. PEPPER. So, in the natural order, the national Government would select crops of that character. I believe the Senator said in answer to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] that to fruit crops is attached a greater degree of hazard than to wheat crops, but the Senator regarded that as a disqualification for fruit crops being included within the benefits of this bill.

Mr. POPE. The Senator misunderstood me. I do not think I commented on the parity of hazards in fruit growing and wheat growing and cotton growing. I admitted that there were hazards, perhaps the same hazards, in fruit growing as in wheat growing. This bill, however, is not adapted to the insurance of perishable products, because it has in it the storage idea, the granary idea, which would not be applicable to perishable commodities such as fruit and vegetables. Therefore, some other form of insurance should be worked out which would adapt the bill especially to fruit and vegetables.

Mr. PEPPER. When the Senator was so gracious as to say he would be desirous of aiding in respect to fruit, he meant to include citrus fruits, I am sure, did he not?

Mr. POPE. Yes; I would include citrus fruits.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. POPE. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. I should like to ask the Senator a question. The bill provides that there will be a base period in any community or section upon which the insurance shall be predicated and premiums fixed, that premiums may be paid either in cash or in wheat, and the losses may be paid either in cash or in wheat. When the premium is fixed on a given farm which over a certain period has shown an average loss of so much, is the premium based upon a fixed rate of so much per acre or bushel or is it based upon a percentage of the loss as shown over such period? In other words, the farmer pays the premium in wheat. Does he pay a certain percentage of wheat over a period of time, or does he pay so many bushels per acre? How is that determined?

Mr. POPE. As I have explained, the first task of the board would be to determine the average yield of the individual farm and then the coverage, and the premium would be determined based upon that average yield. I think I can show how that would work by reference to a table which I had intended to introduce into the RECORD, appearing at page 36 of the hearings. There the Senator will observe a table which has been prepared, showing the determination of the premium rates from the average yield of a farm. Those data are taken from North Dakota. They are the record of a representative farm in North Dakota for the years indicated. The average yield of that farm over the period of 6 years indicated was 8 bushels per acre. In 1930 the farm produced 8 bushels per acre; in 1931, 15 bushels per acre; in 1932, 4 bushels per acre; in 1933, 10 bushels per acre; in 1934, no bushels; and in 1935, 11 bushels per acre. The total shows there were 48 bushels production during those 6 years. A 75-percent coverage of the average yield of 8 bushels per acre would be 6 bushels. Eight bushels divided by 6 would be 1⅓ bushels, which would indicate the premium that ought to be paid on the basis of the average yield of that individual farm. The average yield of the farms in the county would be 1 bushel. Adding the two and dividing by 2 we get the premium of 1⅙ bushels. That is the method to be used in arriving at the premium as to that farm.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the premium for that particular farm is 1⅙ bushels per acre, it may be paid either in wheat or in cash?

Mr. POPE. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. If paid in wheat, I suppose it would not be paid until harvest time. If the farmer paid cash, would he pay it at the time he took out the insurance or when the wheat was harvested and sold?

Mr. POPE. That question has been asked many times, and I am receiving letters now with reference to the payment of premiums. So far as the bill is concerned, it is provided that the board shall determine the manner and time of payment of the premium.

At the very beginning of the program it may be that the average farmer would not have any wheat with which to pay his premium at the time the contract was entered into. However, provision could be made for him to pay it in cash, if he could do so, or in some form of deferred payments. The President's committee recommended that a lien might be taken on the crop and the premium paid at harvest time.

Mr. BARKLEY. Under that plan, obviously it would seem to be unavoidable that the money value of the premium would depend upon whether it was paid in cash and when it was paid in cash, or, if paid in wheat, when it would be paid in wheat, because it would depend upon the market value of the wheat at the time it was paid as a premium. If a farmer had the cash with which to pay his premium in advance instead of paying it in wheat, if wheat was selling at $1 a bushel at that time, but at harvest time wheat was selling at 50 cents a bushel, he would have lost by paying his premium in cash rather than waiting until harvest time and paying it in wheat. The amount of wheat that he would pay as a premium does not depend upon the price, but is a certain percentage of the yield.

Mr. POPE. The statement of the Senator is entirely correct. It seems to be unavoidable so far as legislation is concerned. These are problems for the administration of the act and those who will be charged with the administration of the act will have these problems to solve in order that they may be fair to the farmer and fair to the corporation. These are problems of administration which will face the board.

Mr. BARKLEY. In all likelihood, therefore, it would be impossible to have a uniformity of premium in money value because that will depend upon the method of payment, the time of payment, and the value of the crop at the time it would be available as a part of the premium.

Mr. POPE. Yes.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. POPE. Certainly.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator spoke of paying the premium in wheat or cash. I understand the bill provides that the board may sell the wheat. It does not have to keep it when it receives the wheat in payment of a premium, but may sell it at that time.

Mr. POPE. No. When the wheat is received by the board, it cannot be sold except for the payment of indemnities, as I have already explained, or to a very limited extent to prevent depredation or to prevent deterioration.

Mr. HUGHES. I read from page 9, in paragraph (d):

> From time to time, in such manner and through such agencies as the board may determine, to purchase, handle, store, insure, provide storage facilities for, and sell wheat, and pay any expenses incidental thereto—

And so forth.

Mr. POPE. The "and so forth" is important there, because, when we read on, it will be seen that the wheat cannot be sold except for a specific purpose. The exact language is:

> The corporation shall purchase wheat only at the rate and to a total amount equal to the payment of premiums in cash by farmers or to replace promptly wheat sold to prevent deterioration; and shall sell wheat only to the extent necessary to cover payments of indemnities and to prevent deterioration.

Mr. HUGHES. Then, as I understand, the board would have to hold the wheat.

Mr. POPE. Yes.

Mr. HUGHES. The board could not sell it, and it might terminate, as the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS] said, in the board having wheat at the time the premium was paid which was worth a dollar a bushel, and at the time the wheat could be disposed of or at the time the indemnity had to be paid it would be worth only 50 cents a bushel.

Mr. POPE. The wheat can be disposed of only to pay indemnities. Then if it is sold at the request of the farmer and the price was lower than when premiums were paid it can be seen the farmer would lose, because he is entitled to so much wheat in indemnity. Therefore, the farmer might lose or he might gain.

Here is an interesting feature in connection with it. At the time when a farmer is paying in excess of premiums over indemnity, which means a good crop year, the price of wheat is likely to be lower than it would be during a year of crop failure when the indemnities were being paid. In a chart which appears in the hearings it is shown, as I pointed out the other day, that if the bill had been a law and in operation for the years 1930 to 1936, during the first 3 years, which were good crop years, the farmer would have paid in some 72,000,000 bushels more than would have been paid out in indemnities. The value at the time it would have been paid in would have been about $60,000,000. When it was paid out, during the years of crop failure from 1933 to 1936, the value of the same wheat would have been around $100,000,000, so the farmers actually would get the benefit of $35,000,000 to $40,000,000 by reason of the increase in the price of wheat and the fact that the indemnities were paid out during the deficit years. It can be seen that the farmer is more likely to be benefited due to increase in price than to be damaged as a result of the operation of the program.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. POPE. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK. I may say that I am very greatly in sympathy with the general purposes of this bill; but I should like to ask the Senator how he can possibly justify this committee amendment at the top of page 6:

> SEC. 6. (a) The Secretary shall appoint, in accordance with the provisions of the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, such officers and employees as may be necessary for the transaction of the business of the corporation, which appointments may be made without regard to the civil-service rules and regulations, fix their compensation, define their authority and duties—

And so forth. What provision in that language would prevent the Secretary of Agriculture from fixing the compensation of employees of this Corporation at any figure he pleases?

Within the past few years we had a demonstration of the most lamentable fiasco, I suppose, in the history of the United States—the Federal Farm Board under the Hoover administration. They came down to St. Louis, picked up a couple of small-time wheat speculators, paid one of them $50,000 a year, and paid the other one $30,000 a year for breaking the price of wheat. They picked up down in Arkansas a fellow named Creekmore and paid him $75,000 a year for losing $200,000,000 and breaking the price of cotton; and they paid other employees most exorbitant salaries up and down the line. Is there anything in this bill to prevent the Secretary of Agriculture, under this language, from doing exactly the same thing if he should see fit to do so?

Mr. POPE. It was the thought of the committee that requiring these appointments to be made in accordance with the provisions of the Classification Act of 1923, which would determine the salaries to be paid, would prevent the thing the Senator has suggested. The Classification Act would apply to these appointments.

Mr. BARKLEY. In other words, Mr. President, if the Senator will yield there, the power of the Secretary to fix compensation is limited by the provision setting up rates under the Classification Act, within which the positions would fall?

Mr. POPE. Exactly.

Mr. CLARK. Does the Senator understand that any maximum is provided by the bill as to the compensation which could be paid by the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. POPE. The maximum, of course, would be determined by the Classification Act, which prescribes the salaries for certain types and grades of work.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. POPE. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] was interested in the problem of the compensation to be paid the employees of this organization. I am interested in the question of the civil service. I should like to know what possible justification there can be for disregarding the civil-service standards and the merit system in the appointment of employees under this organization.

All along the line, it would seem, we are making exceptions; we are taking out from under the obligation to maintain a merit system this, that, and the other department and activity of the Government. If we are against the merit system, if we are against the civil service, why do we not say so, and wipe out the whole thing, instead of bringing it to a slow death by torture of this sort?

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, I shall be very glad to answer the Senator.

It will be noted that in the original provision, section 6 (a), it was provided that these employees should be under the Classification Act and under civil-service regulations, with two exceptions. The appointment of attorneys and experts was excepted, and those employed in the Department of Agriculture at the time of the enactment of the measure were also excepted from the civil-service rules and regulations.

Upon the hearings and upon investigation of this matter we found that the exceptions to civil-service rules and regulations exceeded those who might properly be included. It was found that about 75 percent of the employees of this type of corporation would be doing that type of work. For instance, anticipating this question, I have taken the trouble to determine who would not and could not properly be under civil-service rules and regulations.

The local committees are to be utilized; and it is estimated that some $2,000,000 will be appropriated to pay the expenses and small salaries of local committees and their employees. Those local committees are made up of farmers in the various counties in the different States; and it would hardly be proper for the local committees, made up of farmers, to be included under civil service.

The same thing is true of the local secretaries.

The local secretaries of the committees will usually be bank clerks or local insurance men who will serve only part time; and with them will be their stenographers, who will spend only a small portion of their time in this service and will be paid accordingly. That sort of work would not be adapted to civil service.

It will be necessary to have inspectors of grain only for part time, or inspectors of crops that have been destroyed. Let us assume that there is a flood in Maine. Considerable damage is done. The farmers in the immediate neighborhood know better than anybody else the nature and extent of the damage. To send from Washington or from the South, where no wheat is grown, a civil-service man who has had no experience whatever in that sort of thing, would not make for efficiency.

So there will be local inspectors and adjusters rendering only part-time service. The same thing is true of them. There will be appraisers. The same thing is true of them. There will be State committees made up largely of farmers; State secretaries who will usually be ex-county agents; extension service men with clerical assistants, sometimes doing part-time work; regional supervisors of grain reserves. For that purpose experienced grain men will be needed. They may not be able to pass an examination as to educational qualifications, and yet they may know all that needs to be known about taking care of grain. There will be State reviewing adjusters, men with insurance-adjusting experience. There will be regional inspectors, men who ought to be familiar with handling grain. The corporation will need freight-rate clerks, men experienced in handling railroad grain rates. They may not have other educational qualifications, but they will have had experience in this matter. There will be grain office accountants, persons experienced in grain accounting; employees at warehouses, night watchmen, and so on; agents for temporarily handling, buying, selling, and forwarding grain. Premiums payable in wheat may be received which will require the attention of agents to take them to the warehouses. It would be a little bit difficult to send out civil-service employees to look after the matter of loading grain and at times selling and purchasing a little grain for offset purposes. There will be actuaries, persons experienced in actuarial work, who have had experience with rates and premiums in the service of private insurance companies. They would not be suitable for civil-service status, or at least would not naturally have a civil-service status. Research men will be needed to carry on studies as to wheat and other commodities. Persons will be needed with technical and laboratory experience in testing wheat to determine whether or not it is deteriorating.

The employees now in the Department of Agriculture, with valuable experience in agricultural administrative work under the A. A. A. and the Soil Conservation Act, ought not to be included under civil service. Attorneys, experts, technicians, and those who have been working for the A. A. A. and under the Soil Conservation Act, but who are on furlough, who have had experience with farmers' committees, ought not to be included under civil service.

When all those persons are added up it will be found that about 75 percent of all the employment does not lend itself to selection under civil service rules and regulations.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, it sounds to me as though a guilty conscience had fully anticipated my question. [Laughter.]

Mr. POPE. A good conscience anticipated it. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHITE. As a matter of fact, however, I think many of the employees to whom the Senator has referred might with entire appropriateness and with effectiveness be under the civil service. Of course every one recognizes that certain exceptions may properly be made to the civil service; but the thing that troubles me about the whole situation is that over and over and over again measures are coming in here proposing a lifting of the standards of the civil service and providing for appointments without any regard to it; and, of course, when it is desired to do a thing a reason for the proposed action can always be found.

Mr. POPE. I am interested in the Senator's opinion about the matter. I am, however, much more interested in making this measure work than in the matter of civil-service or non-civil-service appointments. I am interested in having farmers out in the field who are competent, who know farming, who know about the handling of grain but who have no civil-service status, participate in this program.

Under the Agricultural Adjustment Act and under the Soil Conservation Act a provision based on merit and efficiency was applied, and about 25 percent of the employees under those two acts are actually civil-service employees; and it is expected that under this program probably 25 percent will have a civil-service status. When, however, there is a flood in my State, or damage done, and there are men in the immediate neighborhood who know what the damage is, I do not propose to send to Washington for a man with a civil-service status, and pay his expenses out there and back; and even if that were done he might be a man from Georgia or Alabama who would not know a thing in the world about wheat.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. POPE. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to compliment the Senator from Idaho for making the best defense of an indefensible position that I have heard in a long time. [Laughter.] No bill ever comes in here which says that the employees provided for by it shall be selected without regard to the civil service which does not make me just a little bit sick at the stomach. I think it is about the most outrageous thing I know.

Further in defense of the Senator, I observe that the bill as he originally introduced it did not contain any such provision about appointments being made without regard to the civil service. The Senate committee apparently inserted that provision. I hope someone will seek to have it eliminated. I shall vote for any amendment to strike out the provision that the employees shall be employed without regard to the civil service. The President can exempt from the civil-service requirements when an emergency arises such as that the Senator points out.

Mr. POPE. I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that there is a provision which reads as follows:

> The appointment of officials and the selection of employees by the Secretary shall be made only on the basis of merit and efficiency.

I will not yield to the Senator from Kentucky or to anyone else in my loyalty to the principles of the civil service, but if the Senator or anyone else can tell me how to make all the exemptions which are necessary in a bill of this kind, I shall be very glad to have the information.

Mr. LOGAN. My position is that we should not make any exemptions, but should leave that to the executive branch of the Government, and the President will find some way to exempt. He has the authority to do so under the law.

Mr. POPE. Then we will have to secure an exemption for an appraiser when we may need an emergency appraiser on the ground to carry out the work of the corporation, or a night watchman in an emergency.

Mr. LOGAN. There are some appraisers who can read and write who might stand a civil-service examination. I do believe that with all of the young college men who are trained in this country, who are seeking work and cannot find it, we will be able to find appraisers and such employees, who could take a civil-service examination; and I do believe that after they have qualified themselves it would be much better to employ them than to have them stand aside and for me or the Senator from Idaho to go out and get someone who is not qualified, but is chosen because he works for us politically, to take a position which ought to be held by some man who has merit.

Mr. POPE. In employing the provision which I read it was my purpose that the appointments should be made strictly—I used the word "only"—on the basis of merit and efficiency. As I said a moment ago, I am in favor of the civil service; I am in favor of extending it just as far as it is applicable; but I am much more interested in the success of the pending measure, and I am interested in the farmers in my State and other States, who may never have had an opportunity to obtain a civil-service status, having just as large a participation in the proposed program as is possible, because when they participate, when their interest is centered in the success of the law, it will be successful in every locality in which it is tried out.

Mr. DAVIS. How many employees will it take to administer the law?

Mr. POPE. I do not know. I would have to make some inquiry and answer the Senator at a later time, because I have no idea. I do know that it is the purpose to use the employees of the Department of Agriculture to as great an extent as possible and to make use of these various committees which have already been organized to administer the Soil Conservation Act and the Agricultural Adjustment Act. Additional employees will be needed, of course, but I cannot give the Senator an accurate idea of the number.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. POPE. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. As I understand from the Senator's answer to the Senator from Maine, it is contemplated that use will be made of local committees in the administration of the act, in an advisory capacity, with respect to premiums, and the payment of awards where there has been damage, and all of the things connected with the administration of the act, somewhat after the fashion of the Farm Credit Administration, which operates through local farm-loan associations, and on up to the Federal land bank in the community or in the State, and then on up to Washington.

I have in mind one of the recently created boards which presumably operates under the civil-service laws, except as to attorneys and experts, and under the designation of "expert" anyone outside the civil service can be appointed if he can be gotten to Washington and trained long enough to make an expert out of him. Then he becomes eligible to be appointed as an expert.

Of course, I think it ought to be obvious that a member of the legal profession should not be required to stand a civil-service examination in order to determine how good a lawyer he is, because the chances are his qualifications would be passed upon by men who knew nothing about the law themselves. But if it be true that it is intended to make use of local committees and local agencies who are familiar with farm matters and know something about the value of crops and all the things which enter into the administration of the act only for a week or a month, many of them without any compensation, as I understand, the question arises in my mind whether it is worth while, from the standpoint of increased efficiency, to require such people to take a civil-service examination before they can serve their fellow men in noncompensating jobs of some kind in which they may be asked to serve in the administration of the act. Is my assumption correct?

Mr. POPE. Yes, and part-time employment of men who may work a few days in a year, or may work a very short time in a job, and, when employment is necessary, very promptly, when an appraisement needs to be made immediately, for instance, simply does not lend itself to civil-service requirements.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, if the civil-service rule was applied to those people the result would be that they would not have an opportunity to serve at all, because they would not take the civil-service examination, or they would not have any opportunity to take it.

I have in mind an organization already in the Government of the United States which is supposed to be under the civil service, except as to lawyers and experts, in which the people of the community in which the service is expected to be rendered were not notified or given any opportunity to take an examination. Eligible lists for those communities, and especially for my State, are made up nine-tenths of people from Michigan, Iowa, Illinois, Wisconsin, and other States, whereas the people in the community were not even allowed an opportunity to take the examination. I certainly think that sort of an administration of the civil-service laws is a farce. It may be that the Civil Service Commission may find better men in Michigan to perform duties in Kentucky, but the people of Kentucky do not think so, and neither do I.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The people of Michigan do. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOGAN. I simply desire to suggest, in connection with what my colleague has said, that what he states is absolutely true, and I am opposed to that as much as he or any other man may be; but I would also like to remind him that there are departments and bureaus not under civil service in which Kentucky receives the same treatment he has pointed out, that is, they send folks somewhere else to take the jobs and look after the affairs whether it is under civil service or not; and I do not know what the reason is.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield?

Mr. POPE. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. When the bill was introduced on February 8 it carried a provision that the employees of the corporation should be under the classified civil service. When the bill was reported, in March, that provision was stricken from the proposal and it was provided that they should not be under the civil service. There has been no structural change in the bill; there has been no change in conditions which warrants a change in the policy. The truth is that the Senator was right in the first instance and he is wrong at the present time.

Mr. LOGAN. I suggested that a while ago, and that we ought not to hold the Senator from Idaho responsible. It is the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry that is responsible, because when the Senator from Idaho introduced the bill it provided that the employees should be drawn from the civil-service eligible lists.

Mr. POPE. I do not want anybody to shift any responsibility from me to anyone else in connection with this matter. I stated to the Senate very frankly that the only exceptions which occurred to me and to those who drafted the bill were those which were included. As the exceptions grew in the way I have already indicated, I kept adding exceptions and adding exceptions, and then I received a copy of a letter written by the Comptroller General in which it was determined that the exception of attorneys and experts—as to experts, at any rate—had to be passed on by the Civil Service Commission. Therefore it is seen that, if we left these employees under civil service and made the exceptions, every exception would have to be passed upon by the Civil Service Commission. Any general provision giving power to the Secretary of Agriculture to appoint those especially fitted to do this type of work would probably have to be passed upon by the Civil Service Commission. Therefore it would not be workable.

When finally I found that the exceptions reached the extent of something like 75 percent of the employees who would be necessary to operate the program, it seemed to me only sensible to join in the amendment which has been proposed to the Senate, and to insert a provision in the bill that they should be appointed as they are under the T. V. A. and under other agencies which have been created of a new and special sort, and require that their appointment should be only on the basis of merit and efficiency.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. POPE. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Does the Senator think that the provision requiring merit and efficiency is sufficient to protect the appointments against a requirement that the applicants be on the so-called Friant list?

Mr. POPE. I do not know as to that. I made as strong as I could the wording of the provision that the only qualification be merit and efficiency. Believing as I do in the merit system—and I yield to no one in my belief that in every instance the appointment should be made on the basis of pure merit and efficiency—it seemed to me that it would only be fair distinctly to set forth the basis and to require the Secretary in making the appointments to use only that basis.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. POPE. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator has stressed the fact that local aid is to be enlisted by way of appraisal, and so forth. Does the Senator mean that the determination, for example, of the premium is to be settled by those who are the beneficiaries of the system in the area affected?

Mr. POPE. No; I should say that, so far as the actuarial work is concerned, that could be done in the office here in Washington, or perhaps some part of it could be done in the regional offices.

Mr. VANDENBERG. As I understand, there is a great spread in the size of the premiums.

Mr. POPE. Yes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. In one instance it may be a half a bushel an acre and in another instance 4 bushels an acre.

Mr. POPE. Yes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator would not in any degree leave the decision of such a matter to those who are in the area affected by the premium to be applied?

Mr. POPE. I would not make a statement so broad. In the very logical development of the program I think that those who have the data concerning the yields of the individual farms and of the localities should make the calculations and the determination of the premiums. So that work would naturally be done by those here in Washington and elsewhere who had that work to do. I had particular reference, however, to all those jobs—we might call them odd jobs—in connection with storing wheat in warehouses as provided in this bill, appraisal work, inspection, adjustment, buying and selling grain in a very small way as provided in this bill, forwarding the grain, looking after the matter of railroad rates, cost of transportation, and the part-time help of a clerical nature employed in the various offices—all that type of work should not be included under civil service.

Mr. VANDENBERG. If the Senator will permit me to say so, I think he can more or less justify the position he takes with respect to that class of employment, but having had some experience with other agricultural operations, and having confronted the so-called Friant list upon many and many occasions, which is nothing but the quintessence of the cheapest spoilsmanship on earth, I should hate to think that this very fine venture was to be tainted in that fashion in any degree whatever.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a request?

Mr. POPE. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] is required to leave the Chamber presently, and he wishes to discuss another matter, and I also desire to discuss it. Will the Senator from Idaho be kind and courteous enough to give way at this point to the Senator from Pennsylvania in order that he may speak? If he would do so, it would be a very great accommodation, and I should appreciate it immensely.

Mr. POPE. I shall be very glad to agree to that request of the Senator from Oregon. I am anxious to get along with the consideration of the bill and not have the discussion diverted into another channel, as occurred yesterday.

Mr. McNARY. I understand that. I will say that the Senator from Idaho has been very kind and has made an excellent explanation of the bill. If he will permit the Senator from Pennsylvania now to obtain the floor, we shall greatly appreciate it.

Mr. POPE. I yield.

CENSUS OF EMPLOYMENT AND UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I have been urging and will continue to urge a thoroughgoing census of employment and unemployment. This is one of the most necessary steps toward economic recovery which we can take. I have addressed the Senate on this subject frequently, but gave especial emphasis to it in my speech of February 17, at which time I submitted a large amount of valuable data showing the status of current knowledge on this subject.

Because of the importance of this issue various resolutions have been introduced by my esteemed and able colleagues. The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] have such resolutions pending in the Committee on Education and Labor and in the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. I wish to add my voice to theirs in calling for an immediate inquiry into this very important matter. There is no reasonable explanation why such a study should be longer delayed.

On March 25 I introduced a resolution asking that the Committee on Education and Labor, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, be authorized and directed to make a full and complete study and investigation of the problems of unemployment and relief, with a view of determining, first, the extent and nature of unemployment and relief needs; second, the relative merits of work relief and direct relief; third, the proper apportionment of financial and administrative responsibilities among the Federal, State, and local governments; fourth, the best method of coordinating the unemployment and relief programs of all governmental agencies; fifth, the number of persons unemployed by reason of the use of labor-saving devices or machinery; and, sixth, methods by which private reemployment may be encouraged.

If there be any one fact that is more obvious than others in the helter-skelter confusion of today's rapid changes, it must be the imperative need for some genuine coordination of our private and governmental employment activities. The waste occasioned by the lack of some workable plan is extremely great and, as a people, we should not tolerate it.

In the last 3 or 4 months a number of organizations and individuals have urged a Nation-wide census of unemployment and employment. These organizations, generally speaking, have been among those which have opposed an increase of Government spending, but they have declared their belief that funds spent for obtaining a census would be money well invested.

First, I wish to submit statistics showing the trends of employment. I ask that they be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

EMPLOYMENT AND UNEMPLOYMENT—THE SITUATION IN THE UNITED STATES

According to an announcement made by the Secretary of Labor there are approximately 6,000,000 more persons at work in nonagricultural industries in the United States than in March 1933. This estimate covers all persons at work, employers, self-employed, and employees, but does not cover those employed in agricultural work or on Federal emergency relief work. The gains reported are widespread. Factory employment reached the highest point since June 1930; employment records of retail and wholesale establishments show a higher level than for any September since 1930; employment in the metal and mining industries exceeded that of any month since April 1931, and the power and light companies employed more workers than they had had on their pay rolls since September 1931.[1]

The Director of the United States Employment Service reports that a total of 3,780,000 placements have been made in private establishments during the 38 months of operation of the Service. These represent many types of occupation—skilled, unskilled, technical, and professional.[2]

Keen interest is being shown by employers and businessmen in assuming responsibility for returning to work as soon as possible the unemployed industrial workers. Business organizations including the United States Chamber of Commerce, the National Association of Manufacturers, the Congress of American Industry, the Coordinator for Industrial Cooperation, and the President's Business Advisory Council have called meetings for a discussion of the problem. The hope has been expressed that as a result of these various conferences united effort will be made for the absorption of a great number of those now unemployed.

[1] The New York Times, Nov. 1 and 18, 1936; communication to the I. L. O.

[2] Labor Information Bulletin, Bureau of Labor Statistics, October 1936.

The President of the United States has called attention to the fact that the sharpest revival in employment has been among the skilled and younger workers, which to a large extent is responsible for the relatively large number of older workers on relief. He expressed the belief that if this policy continues it will lead to the unemployability of this class, which would result in a permanent program of support by public funds. He urged that a fair share of work be given to men over 40 and that opportunities be extended for the employment of unskilled workers. The Secretary of Labor proposes that an effort be made by larger industries to survey their plants, list all jobs suitable for older and unskilled workers and then employ as many as possible from those groups.[3]

The United States Chamber of Commerce estimates that there are now fewer than 9,000,000 unemployed. This compares with a maximum of 15,939,000 unemployed in March 1933. Estimates of unemployment have varied widely and it has been contended that without accurate knowledge no vital attack can be made. The Department of Commerce has drafted recommendations for the appropriation of fifteen to twenty million dollars for a census of unemployed.[4] Subject to the approval of the President a bill will be submitted to the Congress authorizing the Census Bureau to make the survey. Officials of the Bureau state that the count would probably take from 4 to 6 months, but that future estimates could be made more quickly and much less expensively.[5]

JUNIOR PLACEMENT SERVICE

A new feature has been added to the public employment offices, in the form of a specialized junior placement service. The experience of youthful applicants at public employment offices established solely to deal with adults has frequently been found to be disturbing and discouraging. While a large number of interviewers are capable of discussing the educational and vocational achievements of young people they do not find it easy to shift from adults to youths. Junior placement offices set up under the National Youth Administration in cooperation with the State employment services are operating as demonstrating and training centers for State offices which have expressed the desire for the establishment of junior placement services at a later date.[6]

DISMISSAL COMPENSATION FOR FERRYBOAT EMPLOYEES

Approximately 1,200 ferryboat employees in the San Francisco Bay area are covered by agreements similar to the dismissal wage agreements of the railroads,[7] which provide dismissal compensation for loss of jobs on ferryboats due to the completion of two bridges. These agreements were recently signed by the several companies and local unions connected with the ferryboat service.[8]

UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION

Court action attacking the constitutionality of the Federal Security Act is increasing. There are cases now pending in New Jersey, Alabama, Massachusetts, Oregon, and Rhode Island. The New York case is before the Supreme Court of the United States.[9] In the meantime, progress in the enactment of State unemployment compensation laws continues. Texas is the most recent State to pass such a law, bringing the number of States with legislation of this kind to 16. The Texas law was passed on October 27, 1936, and provides for a pooled type fund and for merit rating in 1941. The contributions of employers will be 0.9 percent of their pay rolls in 1936, 1.8 percent in 1937, and 2.7 percent from 1938 to 1941. Employees pay no contributions. Benefits will be one-half of the employees' wages up to $15 a week, with a minimum of $5, and will be paid for a maximum of 15 weeks during the year. A waiting period of 2 weeks is provided for. The Federal Social Security Board has approved the act.[10]

FUNDS FOR THE WORKS PROGRESS ADMINISTRATION

The President has announced that he will ask Congress to vote more funds for the Works Progress Administration partly because the problem of industrial unemployment has not yet been solved and partly because an unexpected drought forced the Administration to spend a considerable portion of its funds for relief in the farm areas.[11]

HOUSING PROGRAM

The executive council of the United States Building and Loan League has recommended that the question of public housing be divorced from the reemployment program and that Government activities in housing projects be drastically curtailed, on the ground that such activities are not within the proper permanent activity of the Government.[12]

CIVILIAN CONSERVATION CORPS

The Director of the Civilian Conservation Corps has reported that there is sufficient urgently needed conservation work still to be done to furnish employment for a corps of between 300,000 and 350,000 men for many years to come. The President has indicated that the Government intends to continue the corps at approximately this strength, and Congress will be asked to reenact the relevant legislation, which expires on March 31, 1937, authorizing the continuance of conservation work and appropriating funds for that purpose.[13]

Mr. DAVIS. The National Manufacturers Association at a meeting in New York on December 10, 1936, adopted the following resolution:

We urge the Government to make an enumeration of the unemployed, defined as those able to accept work, willing to take it, and unable to get it, classified as to States and occupations and as to those who are unemployable.

The Chamber of Commerce of New York State, on January 7, 1937, adopted a resolution urging a Nation-wide survey and census of all wage earners in all lines of industry, as well as those who are unemployed.

Winthrop W. Aldrich, chairman of the Chase National Bank of New York, in a speech on December 8, 1936, before the Illinois Manufacturers Association, reported in the New York Times December 9, 1936, page 41, recommended as one of four steps necessary for the promotion of sound economic recovery:

That the Federal Government make a comprehensive survey of unemployment in order that the problem may be approached intelligently.

Louis Stark, labor correspondent of the New York Times, in its issue of December 26, 1936, after a survey of the Nation's unemployment situation, wrote:

In many quarters those who have considered the problems of unemployment feel that only a new census of the employed and the unemployed can answer the questions that are posed at this time.

Last November, as many Senators doubtless will remember, the officials of the Department of Commerce came forward with a plan to take an unemployment census.

No one knows how many unemployed there are now; and we need to know something of this economic disease, its extent and location, before any intelligent attack can be made on it. Present estimates, widely quoted by Federal officials and others, vary considerably. A thorough census is also needed, therefore, to check up on such estimates.

Louis Stark wrote in the New York Times on December 22, 1936, in a survey of the Nation's relief and unemployment situation, in all estimates of unemployment are nothing but "guesstimates." He added:

Accurate and complete data on the extent of unemployment, the characteristics of the unemployed, their location, sex, health, previous employment and qualifications for employment do not exist. This is a "no man's" land which will not be explored until a new census has been taken.

Mr. President, the composition of the Nation's labor supply has changed so since 1930 that the 1930 census figures are now of little use. A resolution of the New York State Chamber of Commerce, printed in the New York Times of January 4, 1937, declares:

Adequate data are not available of the numbers of new additions to the labor force who have come of age, nor of the withdrawals from the labor force because of old age, death, immigration, permanent physical and mental disabilities, and other factors.

Edwin E. Witte, in the spring issue of the Yale Review, 1937, in an article entitled "Unemployment and Recovery", says:

The depression is now in its eighth year. In this period there has been a large turnover in the national labor supply. Fourteen million new workers, Brookings Institution has estimated, have come into industry and 10,000,000 experienced workers have dropped out. The new workers constitute more than one-fourth of the labor supply of the country.

For lack of full knowledge of unemployment we find ourselves emerging from a depression with a large body of unemployed workers, yet with acute shortages of labor in certain lines and in certain localities. To quote again from a very recent article by Prof. Edwin E. Witte, executive director of the President's Committee on Economic Security, published in the Yale Review, as cited above, we observe that—

Despite the many unemployed, there are distinct shortages of labor in a considerable number of skilled trades. Complaints about the difficulties of getting craftsmen were made by employers as early as the spring of 1935, especially in the metal trades. * * * Since then complaints about labor shortages have multiplied, coming from all parts of the country and relating to many more skilled trades. * * *

These shortages are mainly local, although in electric arc welding, tool making, die sinking, molding, pattern making, and a number of other trades they are rapidly becoming Nation wide. * * * In the metal industry the pinch of being unable to get enough skilled mechanics is already slowing up expansion, and in building construction serious shortages are developing in localities where there is a building boom. Even the W. P. A. has experienced considerable difficulty in recent months in getting a sufficient number of skilled men for high-grade construction projects. While millions of unskilled, semiskilled, and white-collar workers are available, it is becoming increasingly difficult to find mechanics good enough for P. W. A. work on the relief lists. * * *

There are many things that the Government might conceivably have done to avoid the situation which has developed. The C. C. C. might have been set up to train the skilled mechanics which it has now become very apparent are badly needed in industry. Work relief could have been adapted much better than it has been to the skills of the unemployed; more easily, it could have been run to afford a greater incentive to its clients to get back into private employment.

Mr. President, a complete picture of the present employment and unemployment situation is necessary if worse labor shortages, retarding expansion of business, are to be avoided in the future. Full knowledge of present employment and unemployment is also necessary in planning any program for retraining the unemployed, or for any apprenticeship program, as well as for the guidance of youngsters in choosing an occupation.

Such a census would be very valuable for the actuarial and statistical analysis connected with the unemployment compensation laws passed by the States under the Social Security Act. Mr. W. R. Williamson, actuary of the Social Security Board, in an article of March 1937, found in the supplement of the American Economic Review, page 100, entitled "The Federal-State Unemployment Compensation Provisions of the Social Security Act", told the American Economic Association last December that the cost estimates of the President's Committee on Economic Security were crude because statistical data necessary for a full analysis were not available. All the committee had to work with was, to quote his words, "a considerable amount of scattered material compiled in various cities and in one or two State analyses of unemployment."

Mr. President, a complete inventory of present employment and unemployment is indispensable in planning any long-time program for reemployment and relief on a sound basis. Without such an inventory it is impossible to tell how and how fast the unemployed may be reabsorbed by industry. Two officials of the W. P. A., Mr. Howard B. Myers and Mr. John N. Webb, in an article published in the American Journal of Sociology, page 532, January 1937, entitled "Another Census of Unemployment", indicate the kind of information that is badly needed about the unemployed in order to make fairly sound inferences on the question of their employability. These W. P. A. officials say:

Chief among these factors are age, physical condition, duration of unemployment, usual occupation and industry, and continuity and duration of work experience. In combination these data promise to provide a sound basis for estimating the employability of the unemployed. For instance, a study of urban workers receiving unemployment relief shows that of persons leaving the relief rolls because of private employment those having a short duration of unemployment from the usual occupation go first; and that there is a marked inverse relationship between age and duration of unemployment among unskilled and semiskilled workers. Moreover, it is known that the "hard core" of unemployment, representing the least employable part of the idle population, has an overrepresentation of workers from specific occupational and industrial groups. Far too little has been done thus far in examining the relation between the characteristics of the unemployed and their work histories for the purpose of determining the likelihood of return to private employment.

The census technique has been repeatedly used by the F. E. R. A., the C. W. A., and the W. P. A., and the importance of such data for planning future relief programs and future programs for social security has been continually stressed. Mr. Harry Hopkins, quoted in the New York Times, page 37, January 10, 1937, says that an unemployment relief census of 12,685,664 persons on relief in October 1933 was completed in 2 months. In May 1934 a survey of the occupational characteristics of 576,000 relief clients in 79 cities was taken along with surveys of nearly 200,000 relief clients in rural areas. The New York Times of January 10, 1937, page 37, quotes Mr. Hopkins as saying of this survey:

We registered the age, sex, color, occupation, industry, and duration of unemployment of these people on relief rolls. We listed their physical disabilities and the composition of their families.

In March 1935 a census of the usual occupations of workers on relief in the United States was taken, which was a complete inventory of the skills of all workers on relief, not only their primary occupations but also their secondary lines of work. Mr. Hopkins is quoted in the New York Times, January 10, 1937, as having said of this census:

So we took this complete occupational census of 6,152,000 people in the space of 90 days.

Mr. President, on January 15, 1936, the W. P. A. made a survey of the usual occupations of workers eligible for W. P. A. employment. As a result, Mr. Hopkins stated in the New York Times, January 10, 1937:

There was, for example, one female blacksmith on relief in January of this year. What do we know about her? We know her age, her work history, how long she has been out of work, whether she lives in a town or in the country, and her family situation.

We have the same facts about the 7 female teamsters on relief, the 42 women truck drivers, and the 75 women taxicab drivers or chauffeurs, and the 2 railroad switchmen on our rolls, who are women.

Of course these are the usual occupations, like the 17 men on relief whose regular business is taking in washing by the day; but they serve to illustrate the point for all occupations.

Louis Stark, in the New York Times, December 26, 1936, wrote:

The W. P. A. knows about everything there is to be known about more than 6,000,000 persons who are on work relief or eligible for work relief; their ages, sexes, occupations, where they are located, how many there are in any county in the United States, whether they are skilled or unskilled, and even their lack of experience are noted under the heading "Inexperienced persons."

At any moment the W. P. A. can reach out and tell you how many unemployed carpenters on W. P. A. or eligible for W. P. A. there may be in a remote county of North Dakota. From their rolls you can get the number of skilled persons on W. P. A. or eligible to work relief, by occupations; the number of unskilled workers by specific occupations, professional and technical workers, proprietors and managers, office workers, salesmen, newsboys, real-estate agents, dressmakers, servants, farm laborers, barbers, beauty-shop workers.

When it comes to a similar classification of those idle and not on relief no such wealth of information exists.

There is no such wealth of information about the unemployed—probably one-half of those out of a regular job—who are not on relief. The relief administration seems less interested in those unfortunate workers who are out of a job and receiving no public assistance from the Government. In the same interview in which he explained how much data the W. P. A. had on each of its workers, Mr. Hopkins, in the New York Times, January 10, 1937, page 37, said:

Of course we do not have the same precise data on people who fall outside our prescribed responsibility. We are given by law a field in which to operate. That field is our concern.

The F. E. R. A., the C. W. A., and the W. P. A. have financed State-wide censuses of unemployment. A census of unemployment in Massachusetts as of January 2, 1934, was financed from F. E. R. A. and C. W. A. funds. A census of population and unemployment in Michigan as of January 14, 1935, was financed entirely, including the cost of publication, by F. E. R. A. and Federal W. P. A. funds. The Massachusetts census, which was made by a complete house-to-house canvas, was authorized by Mr. Hopkins on December 14, 1933. The Michigan census is a representative sample of over 40 percent of the total population.

On the basis of the 1934 census of unemployment in Massachusetts and the 1930 census, the Harvard Graduate School of Business Administration has published a very interesting study on Unemployment and Prospects of Reemployment in Massachusetts, written by Donald H. Davenport and John J. Croston (August 1936). On the basis of these two censuses, each manufacturing industry is analyzed to ascertain the prospects for reemployment of the unemployed in that line, and the industrial employment problems that are peculiar to Massachusetts are clearly indicated. Similar studies for other States would be very valuable indeed.

The data on the Michigan census are just coming out. The primary purpose of this census was—

> To secure an accurate estimate of the extent of unemployment by occupation classes and to obtain as complete a picture as possible of the major changes in occupation, changes in jobs, and changes in place of work which had occurred since 1930. It was of vital importance, in such a survey, to compare the personal and occupational characteristics of the gainfully employed. As a result the enumeration was planned to provide a detailed analysis of the characteristics of all persons enumerated, whether employed or unemployed. In addition to providing a background against which the characteristics of the unemployed might be projected, the census thus provided a rather complete picture of the characteristics and composition of the entire population of the State.

The introduction to the first series, Michigan Census of Population and Employment, Lansing, July 1936, has the following revealing sentence:

> It was considered desirable to secure data on such items as the value of rental of homes, educational status, relief status, and other factors which would assist in a social and economic classification of the population.

A complete national census would be much more valuable than a series of isolated State censuses on different dates which, however, complete, only result in an incomplete picture of unemployment in the whole country.

Although the Federal relief agencies have made repeated surveys and censuses of those on relief and have financed State-wide censuses of unemployment, Mr. Howard B. Myers, and John M. Webb, two of Mr. Hopkins' aides, in an article in the January issue of the American Journal of Sociology argue against a census of unemployment on the grounds that such a census would not give good data on the very questions upon which the Federal relief agencies have repeatedly been collecting data. They say that a Federal census would not answer such questions as to how long they have been unemployed, from what occupations and industries do they come, and what proportion is employable.

Yet the F. E. R. A. and W. P. A. have given out answers to such questions time after time, and their answers were based on numerous surveys and censuses made by these Federal relief agencies. The W. P. A. is even spending a large sum on a study of one of the particular causes of technological unemployment—which no one seems to be able to define clearly.

When the Federal relief agencies want to make surveys and censuses the officials do not take a "defeatist" attitude and argue about the difficulties involved in doing the job. Why, then, do they go out of their way to argue against a census that will include also those not on relief, a census that will collect the same information for those off relief as has been collected for those on relief? The whole picture ought to be more valuable than only half of the picture on which the Federal relief authorities have collected such complete data by the very methods they condemn.

My attention has been called recently to a report of the current relief situation in 28 selected areas of the United States prepared by the American Association of Social Workers, and issued February 15, 1937, in which the following generalizations are given:

> II. SUMMARY OF FINDINGS
> Significant facts revealed by data secured from the 28 selected areas, with a combined population of 49,512,089, indicate the following situations prevail:
> 1. In all but a few areas States and local governments are finding it increasingly difficult to finance direct relief programs and also make contributions to the W. P. A. program. This stringency has resulted in a general reduction of direct relief adequacy and the adoption of "stop gap" methods for providing even meager assistance to those families not cared for by the W. P. A. program.
> 2. Large numbers of able-bodied employable family heads, certified as in need by local relief agencies, are not being absorbed by the Federal work program.
> 3. These families are being denied any relief in many areas on the ground they are "a Federal responsibility", while in other areas such families are granted very meager aid on an emergency basis.
> 4. The terror of eviction pursues relief families in wide areas where relief agencies find it impossible to pay rents for dependent families.
> 5. Maximum relief allowances of $7.96 per month per family prevail in some Southern States.
> 6. Malnutrition is common among Southern States' relief families, clinic physicians report.
> 7. Stoppage of relief for periods varying from a week to a month have not been uncommon in many sections.
> 8. W. P. A. wages are frequently inadequate to provide minimum subsistence diet for large families. Necessary supplementation of W. P. A. wages by local relief agencies in East and Middle West puts strain on funds available.
> 9. Underemployment (full-time low-paid jobs) is a problem for relief agencies called upon to give relief to supplement low wages in private industry.
> 10. In many areas large numbers of persons certified as eligible for old-age assistance are denied aid, due to lack of funds.
> 11. Able-bodied men in a Western State, denied direct relief as "employable" and unable to secure W. P. A. placement, are reported to be deserting their wives and children in an effort to assure aid for them as an unemployable group.
> 12. Stringent intake policies have been adopted in many areas; for example, property owners, regardless of their need, are denied any relief in two areas tested, while in others any income, no matter how small, automatically bars the family from receiving any aid.
> 13. Nonresidents are a problem in all areas. Three report that no aid is given nonresidents. One stated that families with small children are given temporary aid, but refuses aid to able-bodied unattached persons.
> 14. Staff reductions, due to limitation of funds, are causing complications in many sections, contributing to delays in accepting of applications and granting of relief.
> 15. Surplus food commodities constitute the only form of aid granted in many southwestern counties.

These statements, coming from such a notable organization as the American Association of Social Workers, give added reason for a more thoroughgoing study of employment and unemployment at the present time.

I urge that, at the very earliest possible time, the resolutions on this subject which have been submitted by my very able and esteemed colleague, together with my own resolution, be acted upon favorably so that a comprehensive census program of the Nation's employed and unemployed may be started without further delay.

MINIMUM WAGES FOR WOMEN (S. DOC. NO. 46)

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President——

Mr. DAVIS. I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a Senate document the decision of the Supreme Court, together with the dissenting opinion, delivered March 29, 1937, in the case of West Coast Hotel Co., appellant, against Ernest Parrish and Elsie Parrish, his wife, being an appeal from the Supreme Court of the State of Washington.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

REGULATION OF BITUMINOUS-COAL INDUSTRY

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I expect to be absent from the Senate tomorrow, at which time I understand debate will begin on the bill (H. R. 4985) to regulate interstate commerce in the bituminous-coal industry, and for other purposes, so I desire at this time to make my statement concerning this very important problem.

My first experience with the coal industry came at the early age of 5 when I was taken by an uncle to a colliery where mining operations extended out under the bed of the ocean on the coast of Wales. This early experience is still vivid in my mind. It recalls family conversations where tales were told of horrible conditions in the coal mines of Great Britain a generation or two before I was born. It was then a custom in various localities for small boys 6 years of age to be taken into the mines with their fathers, thus enabling the father to get an extra car of coal under the name of the boy. The boy was supposed to be paid for this extra quota of coal. In reality, however, this meant an extra hour or so of labor for the father and the production of a larger output. It also enabled the operator to take the first steps toward breaking in fresh supplies of labor. Those were the days when working conditions in the mine were still unspeakably terrible—quite beyond description. Although laws were finally enacted forbidding women to work in the mines and prohibiting child labor there, ways were found to circumvent the law, especially as regards the children, and the authorities continued to wink at practices which today stand thoroughly repudiated in the thought of all conscientious citizens.

I come from a family of steel workers who intermarried with coal miners. The traditions of the mill and mine have been intensely real to me all my days. Coal and steel are closely related. When I came to this land my family immediately carried on their trades. My father began work in the iron and steel mills the same day that he arrived in Pittsburgh, Pa. At an early age I went to work in the mills and thus was brought into close touch with coal miners as well as mill workers. This statement applies to my life in the three States of Pennsylvania, Alabama, and Indiana.

These thoughts cluster in my mind as we consider the very important legislation set forth in House bill 4985, regarding the establishment of a commission for the regulation of interstate commerce and the bituminous-coal industry. Practices prevail in this industry which must be abolished if the industry is to be stabilized. Through this proposed legislation vast authority is established in a commission of seven men. If passed, the Sherman antitrust law will be set aside as regards this industry, and new principles of government will be given a 4-year experiment. I do not try to conceal from myself the fact that this is surely a departure from our former principles of government in relation to industry. We should keep our eyes wide open as we examine the thorough-going significance of this very important and so greatly needed legislation.

Before going further I wish to say emphatically that I approve of this proposed legislation. I favor the bill because I believe it necessary that the Nation shall now choose whether we shall assist the coal industry to organize itself through the regulation of a powerful commission or shall allow it to become the stage for riots, lawlessness, and labor disturbances such as our country has not known in many years. Cutthroat competition, low wages, and the denial of the right of collective bargaining, have forced Congress to a consideration of these issues. Mob law, waste, and injustice must be ended in the bituminous-coal industry. Some of the features of the bill represent a definite change from the line of thought and practice which I have cherished during the years. Price-fixing agreements have their dangers. The compulsory nature of the proposed legislation may seem stringent to many persons. The waiving of the antitrust laws is not to be lightly undertaken. But it is my considered judgment that if the proposed legislation be administered in a practical way by a commission nonpolitical in character, as provided in the bill, and if tried as an experiment for a period of 4 years, the Nation should benefit by it.

The success of the legislation will be largely dependent on the personnel of the commission and the use which it makes of this unprecedented authority. I question the advisability of having seven commissioners when in similar commissions, with but one or two exceptions, five have proved to be satisfactory. The commission will have all the regulatory powers necessary to keep competition alive and yet within reasonable limits. Attention should be called to the provision of the bill that two of the proposed commissioners shall be experienced coal miners, and two shall have had previous experience as producers, and none of them shall have any financial interest, directly or indirectly, in the coal industry, the sale or manufacture of equipment for the coal-mining industry, the production of oil or gas, the generation, transmission, or sale of electric power, and so forth.

The personnel of the commission will be determined through Presidential appointment. I am especially interested in the provision which calls for the appointment of two of the commissioners from among those who have had experience as coal miners. These men should be able to bring to the council table the wisdom of practical experience as well as broad understanding. We need leadership which is mature, unbiased, practical, and thoroughly humanitarian. We need commissioners who understand the workingman, and who have a comprehensive picture of all the varied elements which must be fitted together for the harmonious operation of the coal industry. The presence of such members on the commission should insure a careful consideration of the practical needs of the miners, their working conditions, their wage necessities, their rights in collective bargaining, their civil liberties, and their general rights as workers. If the appointment of the personnel of the commission be nonpolitical in character, as contemplated in this bill, the miners themselves will have a chance for a true representation of their needs in the councils of the commission, which otherwise will be denied them.

I have confidence in Chairman Hosford. He has been identified with the coal industry. He comes from the greatest coal State in the Union. He knows the heartaches and miseries of the coal industry. He also understands its great opportunities and potentialities. He knows what it has been like when prices were high, and he knows how cutthroat competition and price cutting brought down both prices and wages to such a point as to beggar the entire industry. I repeat, Mr. President, I have great confidence in Mr. Hosford.

The time has come when we can no longer endure the impending disasters in the coal fields without the aid of the Government in providing for a more equitable adjustment of these problems. I have been actively interested in all the legislation which has been enacted for this purpose. In fact, when the first bill relating to the stabilization of the coal industry was introduced I appeared as Secretary of Labor to offer testimony before the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the Senate in support of the bill. Later, when I came to the Senate, I introduced a similar bill, held long hearings before the Committee on Mines and Mining, and devoted a large amount of my time to a further study of this problem. I was on the subcommittees which considered both the present bill and that of last year.

I hope the voluntary agreement which prevails between miners and operators in the coal industry may be continued during the coming 4 years, which should give support to the proposed legislation and the work of the commission.

At this point in my remarks I ask that a news article taken from the well-known newspaper Labor, describing the views of a large coal operator regarding the proposed legislation, may be included in the RECORD as a part of my statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

[From Labor for Mar. 30, 1937]

BIG COAL OPERATOR UNBURDENS HIS SOUL—SAYS BUSINESS IS BOOMING AND PROSPECTS FINE—PREDICTS NEW DEAL FOR SMALL CONSUMER—MINE OWNERS WILL SIGN WAGE PACT WHEN GUFFEY BILL IS PASSED, HE DECLARES

The big coal operator sank contentedly into the soft cushions of the Willard Hotel lobby. He had had a good dinner and was disposed to talk.

"The bituminous industry produced 11,000,000 tons last week", he said. "So far as I can recall, only once in the industry's history has that record been topped. Prices are good.

"Do you realize that for years mine owners were supplying railroads and other big industries with coal at less than cost? Most people do not know the meaning of 'captive mines.' Those are mines owned by big industry and used to compel the rest of us to beat down our prices.

"It's the 'yardstick' idea that Uncle Sam is adopting to compel the Power Trust to charge consumers fair rates. The Power Trust is complaining, just as we complained about the 'captive mines.' The difference between the two schemes is that Uncle Sam uses his 'yardstick' to benefit the masses of the people. Big industries have been using the 'captive mines' to swell the profits of a few.

"The Pennsylvania Railroad worked the scheme, got cheap coal for itself, and seriously crippled the coal-mining industry of Pennsylvania.

"Of course, the worker is the principal victim of this 'chiseling' policy. When we have to cut our prices we try to reimburse ourselves by 'gypping' our men. There are many ways to do it besides cutting wages. We can raise the rent of our houses, we can boost the prices in our stores, and there are other devices. And we use them all.

"Things are better now because we are forcing industry to pay a higher price for coal. That enables us to make overtures to the domestic consumer. He and the coal digger have been the twin 'goats' of the mining industry. To make up what we lost by supplying industry with coal below cost, we boosted the price of domestic coal and, as I said before, 'soaked' our miners.

ANGLING FOR CONSUMER

"The consumer got sore and turned to oil. That hit our revenues. We have spent millions on research to solve the problem. Now we are putting on the market an automatic device which will enable us to dump your supply of coal into a hole in the yard near your house. A thermostat will decide when it should be fed into your furnace so as to maintain a uniform temperature. We can undersell the oil burners and, we believe, win back the domestic consumer.

"Will there be a strike? No. John Lewis and his United Mine Workers have promised us they will persuade Congress to put through the Guffey coal bill, which will give the coal operators an opportunity to form pools for the sale of their coal. Thus we will stabilize prices and profits.

"The wage agreement will be signed after Congress has passed the Guffey bill. There is one possible hitch. Big buyers have been laying up surpluses. It is possible we will close down for a couple of weeks. The newspapers will call this a strike and will make a great hulabaloo about it. As a matter of fact, it will be just a suspension to enable the market to catch up with our output.

LEWIS CAN CLAIM VICTORY

"Of course, the miners will lose 2 weeks' wages, but if industry continues to increase production, as it has been doing for the last few months, we will be able to give them comparatively steady employment after the 'strike' is over. In addition, it will give Mr. Lewis an opportunity to announce that he has achieved another victory.

"But I assure you the agreement which will finally be signed is now practically ready for signature.

"The Interstate Commerce Commission is struggling with the problem of establishing freight rates for coal. Personally I think the Commission is doing a mighty good job under very difficult circumstances. The operators in every coal field are endeavoring to get an advantage in the matter of rates. A differential of 10 or 15 cents a ton makes all the difference in the world.

MUST CONSIDER MANY FACTORS

"Such an 'edge' might enable West Virginia, for example, to crowd Pennsylvania out of the New England coal market.

"The I. C. C. must take into consideration a score of factors in fixing rates. It's an extremely delicate task.

"For years coal-mine operators engaged in the merry task of cutting each others' throats, paying their miners starvation wages, making the small coal consumer pay all the traffic would bear, and more, and subsidizing industry by selling coal below cost. It was a crazy game.

AND STILL THEY KICK

"The Roosevelt administration has endeavored to end it and has measurably succeeded. Those are the facts, and yet probably a majority of the coal operators are still complaining about 'governmental interference with business.'

"That's an 'open confession', young man, and the theologians tell us 'an open confession is good for the soul.' I wonder if your labor paper will have nerve enough to print the story."

Well, there it is for what it is worth. A true story as related to Labor by a coal operator who has "played the game" for many years.

Mr. DAVIS. Great care must be exercised to keep the appointment of the entire personnel of the Commission free from politics. I see no reason why the personnel of the statistical division or members of the staff of the consumers' counsel should be exempt from civil-service regulations. These are types of work which ordinarily are performed by those having civil-service status, and I firmly believe that in these instances the same provisions should apply. It cannot be said too often that the chief purpose of the bill should be to provide justice for the coal miners of the country and the operators who desire to see their business conducted in an orderly, law abiding, and businesslike way, without destroying the right of the worker to collective bargaining and the wages necessary for the maintenance of decent standards of living. These are the true objects of the bill, and should not be placed in jeopardy by items which might be used to serve purely partisan appointive purposes.

Writing in 1926, Dr. Harold G. Moulton, president of the Brookings Institution, in the preface of Arthur E. Suffern's book, the Coal Miners' Struggle for Industrial Status, said:

Owner and slave, lord and serf, master and servant, employer and employee, employers' association and trade union! Change and evolution are apparent in the very terms that have been used in defining industrial relationships in different eras. The long struggle of contending groups has resulted in profound changes in the legal as well as in the economic and social position of masses and classes. The first landmark in the struggle was the attainment by the worker of the status of a freeman, with power to bargain as an individual with his particular employer. A second stage was achieved when groups of workers were able to bargain collectively with individual employers. A third stage is the making of collective agreements between representatives of all, or a considerable part, of the workers in a given industry and the associated employers of the industry—collective bargaining in the narrower sense thus being replaced by negotiations entered into by official representatives of associations of workers and owners. This third stage has as yet been reached only in certain industries.

In order to understand the significance of the action contemplated in this bill for the establishment of a coal commission, some consideration should be given to the various developments which have preceded the present plan. Excerpts gathered from Dr. Suffern's book on this subject, when put together, are herewith presented for the information of all who are concerned with this problem.

A regime of cutthroat competition among operators and of individual bargaining between employers and employees resulted in the exploitation of the workers. Certain outstanding abuses have been such specific causes of industrial unrest that the miners demanded collective action to eliminate them.

Short weighing of coal and excessive "dockage" (deduction) in weights were among the earliest complaints of the miners. These abuses account for the demand of the miners for checkweighmen employed by themselves. The miners claimed that the payment of wage rates based on the amount of coal which would pass over screens of a certain mesh and area was subject to abuse.

Mr. President, out of my own experience, as I have at one time stated on the floor of the Senate, I commend coal operators who will not tolerate these abuses, and prefer to be honest in their weighing of coal. I have known operators who paid their miners an increase of 15 percent in wages without any increase in tonnage, rather than follow the customary curtailments advised by checkweighmen.

I quote further:

The nonpayment for "dead work", such as bailing water from a miner's working place, posting the roof, laying track, cutting clay veins and spars, and removing all obstructions which hindered the mining of coal, was a cause of much dissatisfaction. In most cases the miner faced the alternative of doing these things or of losing his job. The operators insisted that the piece price per ton included payment for such work.

The company stores were another source of grievance. Although such stores rendered great service in isolated communities, they frequently had a monopoly on the patronage of all workers employed. The miners complained of the prices charged and claimed that those who refused to trade at company stores were denied equal opportunity to work.

The length of the working day has always been a source of contention. The miners desired uniformity of the working day and reduction of the number of hours. Uniformity of the working day was thought of as a means of placing the operators on the same competitive level in that respect, otherwise many operators would compel their men to work unduly long hours for the prevailing wages. The miners wanted to shorten the working day in order to have time for life outside of working hours.

Toward the close of 1860 a call was sent out by union leaders in Illinois appealing to the miners to unite and to form an organization national in scope. Organized effort was pointed to as the means to obtain their rights and to ameliorate their conditions. The American Miners' Association, organized by a convention January 28, 1861, was the first national union of mine workers in America.

The union was short lived, because of internal dissensions and disastrous local strikes during the years of depression which followed the Civil War. By 1868 it had lost its hold and gradually dwindled away. Although the national union was disrupted, local unions persisted in both the bituminous and anthracite fields until another national organization came into existence in 1873. Their efforts to gain recognition and collective bargaining were generally thwarted by the operators by devices now well understood. With the refusal to recognize the union and negotiate a wage scale, the miners were generally faced with the alternative of backing down or of declaring a strike. When a strike was declared the cperators resorted to the importation of strikebreakers, blacklisting, and requiring those who decided to return to work to sign contracts at the wage rates offered by the employer. These contracts also required the miners to give up their affiliation with the union. (They were commonly known as "yellow-dog contracts.") Armed guards were employed to protect the strikebreakers and the property of the employers.

Many of us remember when trainloads of foreign workmen, imported labor, were brought into mining communities to compete with mine workers. But now, with the restrictions imposed through our protective immigration laws, and now that our foreign-born population has become so homogeneous and so accustomed to American ideals of labor and living, these practices are no longer permitted without incurring the condemnation of an enlightened public.

It would be impossible here to relate all of the early history which has led to the present state of affairs in the coal industry. Suffice to say that the problem has been with us a long time and is still with us. The following statement made by a joint committee of operators and miners in 1885 sounds as though it might have been issued but yesterday. I submit a portion of it:

> The history and experience of the past make it apparent to every intelligent and thoughtful mind that strikes and lock-outs are false agencies and brutal resorts for the adjustment of the disputes and controversies arising between employing capital and employed labor. They have become evils of the gravest magnitude, not only to those immediately concerned in them but also to general society, being fruitful sources of public disturbance, riot, and bloodshed. Sad illustrations of this truth are now being witnessed in certain of our large cities and in several of the mining and manufacturing centers of the country. These industrial conflicts generally involve waste of capital, on the one hand, and the impoverishment of labor, on the other. They engender bitter feelings of prejudice and enmity and enkindle the destructive passions of hate and revenge, bearing in their train the curses of widespread misery and wretchedness. They are contrary to the true spirit of American institutions and violate every principle of human justice and of Christian charity.

Mr. President, that statement was made over 50 years ago, and yet the basic problems there stated are still with us today.

A history of collective bargaining will show that while arbitration has frequently been used to settle disputes, the emphasis in the bituminous field has been upon conciliation and compromise. In the anthracite field a system of arbitration has been in effect since 1903; but even there the great majority of cases have been settled by conciliation before being submitted to the umpire.

Rather elaborate procedure has been worked out in the central competitive, southwestern, and the anthracite fields for handling disputes from their point of origin until they are finally disposed of by the highest authorities representing both sides. Penalties for violations of the contract are agreed to and delimitations are set upon the activities of the representatives of both sides.

The great majority of disputes are settled locally and never become a matter of record in conjunction with the procedure established to deal with appeals. Of the cases which are appealed the great majority are settled in the early stages of the procedure for appeal. This is as it should be; otherwise the machinery would become top heavy and occasion intolerable delay.

In the past the public has been mainly concerned about obtaining coal at the lowest price regardless of the conditions under which the miners worked, or of the extent to which the operators opened unnecessary mines and wasted resources in an effort to make profits on their investment. The public faces the fact that the miners are consumers as well as workers and that they demand wages which permit them to maintain and better their standard of living. They are also citizens and demand that their civic rights be protected.

During and after the World War, when there was such a demand for coal, I well recall the higher wages which prevailed in the industry. Apparent prosperity led to large-scale production which could not be continued in normal times. Ever since then there have been difficult times in the coal fields, especially in the bituminous-coal industry. Wage cutting, seasonal unemployment, deserted coal mines, and stranded coal-mining populations have characterized the industry. There is no class of people in America who deserve more genuine consideration at the hands of their Government than the coal miners. It will be very difficult to solve their problems or to enable them to solve their own problems, but collective bargaining and organization are necessary steps.

During the time I was Secretary of Labor we were constantly engaged with these difficulties. Our experience has led to some of the measures which stand written into law today and others which are now pending in Congress. The legislative enactments of the last few years do not represent the views of any one political party, although they were written into law through party responsibility. But in a larger sense they represent the careful findings of many years of patient research by the various departments of the Government in collaboration with private agencies representing the welfare interests of workers, consumers, and industrial management.

For 20 years, 1900–19, according to Geological Survey reports gathered from coal operators, strikes in coal mines resulted in the loss of 124,747,199 man-days. But in the same time in the same mines there were lost 1,053,747,199 man-days through no market, or on account of transportation, disability or break-downs at the mines. In other words, 10.5 percent of the total loss in the coal-mining operation in 20 years was due to strikes, while 89.5 percent loss during the same time was due to causes other than strikes and lock-outs. While this ratio of loss would not apply to all other lines of industry, it does apply to a lesser extent in a great many other lines of industrial endeavor.

Because coal mining is so disorganized many manufacturers have been forced for their own protection to go into mining. It is an evidence of the short-sightedness of the coal industry that it drives what ought to be its best customers—that is, the big corporations—into mining for themselves, not, as they say, to make a profit on mining, but to insure themselves a steady supply of a commodity of which we have unlimited quantities.

Taking the bituminous-coal industry as it now stands, any lowering of wages would not help us to get better or cheaper coal. The question is not one to be solved by tinkering with wages. That is only the superficial view. We must go deeper.

Our business prosperity cannot be sustained, much less made permanent, if one of the great foundation industries is not regularly profitable. The mine owners must get their return out of the use of coal by the railroads, by industry, and by householders. The miners' income arises from the same source. But unless the miners receive wages adequate to maintain a decent standard of living they will not call for the products of industry and therefore industry will not need so much coal. On the other hand, if coal is delivered to industry or to householders at an excessive rate, then the householder has less to spend for other commodities because he has to spend more for his coal. This tells at the factory in fewer orders, lower production, and smaller purchases of coal. The factors are so interdependent that they cannct be separated, but at the hub of them is the fact that while coal is in chaos the prosperity of the entire country is in danger.

Industries of all kinds have been buying coal below the cost of production. That, however, has not helped industry. The miners, whose average earnings were 91 cents an hour in 1922, were receiving only 68 cents an hour in 1929. These conditions came to prevail because of cutthroat competition, whereby the price of coal was reduced by slashing wages. The miner at the end of an 8-hour day in 1929 had about $2 less to spend than at the end of a workday 7 years before. His average earnings for a half month in 1929 were cut down to $50, but during many months there was no work. Today, with 8 years of depression added to the distressing conditions which prevailed before 1929, the miner cannot earn a living.

The people of the United States are perfectly willing to pay for their coal a price that will yield a fair profit and a good wage, but in return for the price they want their coal in a dependable and unbroken supply and without the present stoppages and fluctuations in price that constantly disturb American industry. To remove this disturbance and to guarantee stability and prosperity to the mining industry, I believe the American people are willing and anxious to see the industry properly organized and brought up to the standards of efficiency maintained in all the other great industries.

When this commission gets to its task it will find that no other industry in the country has had the benefit of such prolonged, intimate, and painstaking study—most of it at Government expense. Over a period of 10 years the Fuel Production Committee of 1917, the Fuel Administrator from 1917 to 1919, the Bituminous Coal Commission of 1921, the Federal Fact Finding Commission, not to mention various congressional and State legislative committees, have all examined the ills of the mining industry and have reported upon them in detail.

I hope this commission, when appointed, will realize and help the Nation to realize that coal is the foundation of our economic life. Particularly is this true of my own State of Pennsylvania. Not only are immense quantities essential to the staple industries of the country, but coal is indispensable to every household, regardless of wealth or station.

Coal is not going out. It is and will remain an essential industry, for it is the greatest of the primary sources of heat. With the development of electricity, the manner of using coal is changing: but whether it be used in the form of blocks or pulverized dust to be fed to electric turbines, it will always be the chief fuel for the power-house, and can only here and there be displaced by water power. The railroads will continue to use coal directly and indirectly through electricity, while the blast furnace to use coke and coal will be with us for many a year. It is absurd even to talk about coal having had its day.

Peak production in the United States occurred in 1918, when under wartime pressure 678,000,000 tons of anthracite and bituminous coal were mined, of which 579,000,000 tons were bituminous. It is safe to assume that in the year of peak production—namely, 1918—all mines were operating at top speed. In order to make a comparison of the current situation with the peak year of 1918 and to show what the existing mines can produce, let us take the month of February 1937, when all the remaining mines were running at top speed. In the State of Pennsylvania the month of February showed that the State as a whole could produce 135,000,000 tons, or only within 42,000,000 tons of the maximum production attained in the State when all mines were running full in 1918. Of this drop in productive capacity 23,000,000 tons has occurred in western Pennsylvania, principally in Fayette and Westmoreland Counties, where the exhaustion of the Pittsburgh seam of coal has been the prime factor in the reduction of mine capacity. While numerous small mines working out bits of outcrop coal or stumps and ribs abandoned by former operators have come into the picture, less than half a dozen major operations have been constructed in the past 20 years in this western Pennsylvania territory.

Reports of the United States Geological Survey and the United States Bureau of Mines indicate that hydro-generated electricity, fuel oil, natural gas, and domestic coke are supplanting coal annually to the extent of 129,462,509 tons. But with increasing evidence that oil reserves are apparently much lower than is commonly thought, we cannot afford to abandon the coal industry, especially when industrial activity is increasing so rapidly around the world because of extensive building of armaments. It would be suicidal for America to abandon her coal-mine production, when at any time military emergencies comparable to those of the late war may put additional demands for fuel production of all sorts upon us.

The American people are sympathetic with the coal miner when his cause is intelligently presented to them. What average man would want to exchange places with the coal miner for a livelihood? Which one of us would want to rise in the early hours of the dawn, don dust-covered clothing, and, lamp in hat, descend a thousand feet into the earth to toil underground to earn his daily bread? It is a well-known fact that the coal miner is a long striker. He knows the dangers to which his life in the mines is exposed. He figures that the day he strikes may be just the day when, as a result of his absence from the mine, he may escape a mine accident.

THE MINE EXPLOSION AT THE KRAMER MINE

Mr. President, I wish to bring to the attention of the Senate an incident which I believe is most worthy of mention at this time. At about 5:30 last Saturday afternoon, March 27, an explosion occurred in the Kramer bituminous coal mine, which is located at Stump Creek, Jefferson County, Pa. When the explosion occurred there were five mining officials of the company in the mine on an inspection trip. Three of them escaped unharmed, their lives very probably being saved as a result of rock dusting which had previously been done to prevent the spread of explosions. These men gave the alarm and soon, together with five others, entered the mine in an effort to rescue the two men who had failed to escape. Just before reaching the two men, a second explosion occurred, and the seven men were killed, making a total of nine fatalities, all being mine officials, including the mine foreman and assistant foreman.

At midnight an official of the Pennsylvania Department of Mines notified the United States Bureau of Mines at Pittsburgh, Pa., that help was needed, and before 2 a. m. six safety experts of the United States Bureau of Mines were on the way to the mine with one of the Bureau's mine-rescue trucks loaded with mine-rescue equipment. Upon arrival at the mine these Federal experts cooperated with the State department of mines, as well as the operating company, sending out a call for volunteers from adjacent mines in an endeavor to recover the victims of the two explosions, and at the same time to take adequate precautions to prevent further loss of life.

Under ordinary circumstances there are approximately 800 men employed in this mine, but the fact that the explosions occurred on Saturday, which is a nonworking day for miners, probably resulted in a great saving of life. Although the nine dead had been removed from the mine by midnight Sunday, there remained two United States Bureau of Mines men to lend every assistance to the department of mines and the operating company in preparing the mine for further operation.

The part which the United States Bureau of Mines took in this whole situation is a most commendable one and one which shows clearly the excellent work that this Bureau is performing in its safety activities and in the interest of humanity.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. RADCLIFFE in the chair). Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. DAVIS. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. I should like to ask the able Senator from Pennsylvania, conscious as I am of his long experience in matters pertaining to this subject, and because of his interest in behalf of the welfare of miners, what step is being taken now, if any, by way of provisions contained in the pending bill, or any legislation of which the able Senator is aware, by which our Government can in some form continue examinations so as to anticipate just such explosions as the Senator has described, with the view of preventing and avoiding such accidents?

Mr. DAVIS. The commission will have the power, under this bill, to supervise the entire industry. The Congress itself is delegating this authority, as I see it, to the commission.

Mr. LEWIS. That is done in the pending bill?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes; in the bill that is now pending. For that reason I am for the bill. As chairman of the commission which was appointed under the law, which was subsequently declared to be unconstitutional by the Supreme Court, Mr. Hosford has been serving now for more than a year. He is one of the ablest, one of the most conscientious, one of the best men of whom I know in the United States for that position.

Mr. LEWIS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, while coal-mine accidents are not so frequent as formerly, they still occur. The coal in many mines is highly volatile in character.

Let me digress for a moment, while the distinguished Senator from Illinois is here, and further state to him that the bill now pending will help to stabilize the industry in his own State. The bill has for its purpose the stabilization and bringing together of the mines under the strict supervision of the commission. The Sherman law itself is proposed by the bill to be set aside, and the commission will then be able to work out a plan within the next 4 years to give permanent employment to those who should be employed in the mines, provided, of course, the market calls for the amount of coal which may thus be produced; and I am sure the Department of Labor, with the able man at the head of the employment service, Mr. Persons, will do its utmost to find work for those unable to follow their work in the mines.

Mr. LEWIS. I appreciate the reference the Senator finally makes as to Illinois, and I desire to add that it is because of frequent accidents in coal mines in the State of Illinois, carrying with them deplorable fatality, such as the one described by the able Senator lately occurring in Pennsylvania, that I am so interested to know what steps are on the eve of being taken, if any, to avoid such accidents in the future.

Mr. DAVIS. I will refer to that matter in just a moment.

Mr. LEWIS. I will listen with great interest.

Mr. DAVIS. As I have said, the coal in many mines is highly volatile. The coal dust suspended in the air during the course of mining operations at the face lodges on the rib, roof, and floor of the entries. This creates a serious hazard in the case of a gas explosion, because that frequently where explosions are experienced the coal-dust hazard is perhaps more serious than the ignition of gas, except where the latter is of an extremely large volume, I am told.

Let me say to the Senator from Illinois that there is a mine of this sort in the central part of his State. Coal dust gathers in such mines; and if extra precautions are not taken, will blow up the whole mine.

The condition to which I have adverted was made more clear to me by my recent trip abroad last fall, when I traveled in the coal fields of England and Wales, where over 125,000 coal miners were unemployed. Labor conditions were so bad that the Duke of Windsor, then King of England, made a special visitation among these people to see for himself the distressing conditions in which they worked. News commentators have said that the King spent his last day in office preparing to file his report of this visitation with the Government. However, bad as these conditions are, I am frank to say that they are no worse than those which prevail in various sections of our own country.

Last month a very prominent coal operator from England, a very distinguished member of the British Parliament, visited America.

It will be recalled that he visited us here in the Senate Chamber. When I asked him what news he had of the coal fields in Wales he said:

> The demand for coal is so great that we have been unable to find the skilled men necessary to work in the mines. Many of our skilled laborers have left their trades when mines were inactive and no younger generation has grown up to replace their ranks. As a result now at a time when England needs skilled workers in the mines and when work opportunities are great because of the pressure which the Nation feels for adequate national defense, there is a shortage of labor.

My own observation bears out the truth of this. It takes at least a generation to make a good coal miner or a skilled mechanic.

I submit herewith a table of the comparative coal-mine accident data of Germany, Great Britain, and the United States, which shows that, despite the efforts which have been made in this country to check industrial accidents of all kinds, the United States still lags behind these two other countries in preventive measures.

I ask to have the table printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. RADCLIFFE in the chair). Without objection, the table will be printed in the RECORD.

The table is as follows:

NOTE.—Above figures compiled from official reports.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, although only a boy of 4 years at the time, I can never erase from my mind the memory of that horrible day back in Wales when a terrible mine accident occurred in which almost 300 coal miners lost their lives. A holy day was proclaimed in this the town of my birth, so that all the townspeople might be present at the burial of the dead. Even to this day I can picture that scene and in memory hear the sound of the clatter of wooden shoes, worn by the people of those days, as they walked in a long, mournful procession.

This scene is comparable to the distressing news which overwhelmed our entire Nation when word came recently of the terrible accident at New London, Tex. The news magazine, Time, for March 29, 1937, carries the following statement concerning this disaster:

> United Gas Co. added an ironic note by revealing that up to this January it had sold the New London school board a natural gas mixed with a telltale odorant that might have prevented the blast. But the most ironic product of the tragedy was right on top of the wreckage. Blown out of the ruined building was a section of blackboard on which someone had scrawled: "Oil and natural gas are east Texas' greatest mineral blessings. Without them this school would not be here and none of us would be here learning our lessons."

Certainly if a coal commission be established it will recognize that it is better to have steady production of coal and peace rather than strikes and the soaring prices which come during times of industrial warfare at great cost to the consuming public. During the war prices soared to $7 and $8 a ton for bituminous coal, but, in many places, it dropped at the mine to sell at less than the cost of production. What possible excuse can there be for coal to be sold at less than $1.50 a ton at one time, no matter what place it be, while it goes soaring 300 or 400 percent during boom or strike times? Certainly the commission will recognize in these conditions of price variation a challenge to stabilization. Surely also there is need for the maintenance of uniform prices according to geographical areas within the industry. Data for 1935 show that productivity in the industry per man-day will be approximately 5 or 6 tons. I might say to the Senate that in Great Britain and in countries of Europe 1 or 2 tons per man are produced, while in the United States 5 or 6 tons of coal are produced per man.

Mr. President, I believe that stabilization of the coal industry through legislation of this type is now necessary. I am going into it with my eyes wide open. I believe it is the only way out of the present chaos in the bituminous-coal industry. Beyond doubt, there will be certain large producers who will oppose it, but, if the commission will keep competition open, hold prices within the reach of the average consumer, and bring order where there is now confusion wages will be more equitable and the public will profit from the stabilization of the industry.

Mr. President, collective bargaining is the most practical solution for our labor problems. In it we shall find a release from the questionable practices of sit-down strikes and the intolerable menace of industrial espionage. Believing as I do in the worker's right to quit his job and knowing that industrial management is fairly entitled to the right of civil protection for company property, I can hold no brief for either of these rights if distorted into the abuses of industrial espionage wherein one employee is hired to spy on another, family relationships are disturbed, and those who incur company ill will are blacklisted, or the abuses of sit-down strikes where, without regard for legal restraint, company property is seized for nonproductive purposes.

How much more profitable it would be for all concerned if industry and labor should spend but a small fraction of the money now spent preparing for industrial warfare in the constructive and practical pursuit of industrial peace. If 10 percent of the money spent to secure injunctions, buy hand grenades and tear gas, hire spies, and conduct propaganda against labor organizations were used to sustain a practical program of cooperation between labor and industry around the council table in the spirit of good will and fair play, the Senate Committee on Civil Liberties would not be so haunted with the ghosts of industry and the sit-down strikes of labor as it now appears to be.

Mr. President, a declaration signed by industry and labor jointly protesting against these common abuses would pave the way to a more intelligent consideration of the economic problems which influence the lives of all of our citizens. This must come voluntarily, but until such action shall be taken it will be imperative to have industrial legislation to deal with these problems.

I favor the bill because I believe it necessary that the Nation shall now choose whether we shall assist the coal industry to organize itself or allow it to become the stage for riots, lawlessness, and labor disturbances such as this country has not known in many years. Improved conditions have become possible in the railroad industry because of coordinated activity. The public knows that coordination insures better returns to investors in railroad stocks and in better transportation for the public itself. If transportation is one of the foundations of our national industrial structure, coal is another, and the argument that works for the betterment of one applies to the other.

I know of no legislation which gives complete and universal satisfaction. I do not expect that this bill, if enacted into law, will prove to be an exception. I know in advance that it will not please everyone, but certainly it comes as a result of a thorough study, over a long period of time, based on the report of not only one committee, but of various committees and commissions which have worked at the problem in the interest of the public welfare.

Recently it was brought out in the hearings before the Naval Affairs Committee, so ably conducted by my respected colleague the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], that unless new oil reserves, not now in prospect, shall be opened up, our national resources in oil may not last more than 15 years. If this be the case, we shall do well to husband all of our natural resources, including coal, the primary and basic power and fuel resource.

The Commission will have to use present machinery of conciliation and persuasion found in the Department of Labor for the settlement of labor disputes, added to the power entrusted to the good offices of the President, as no other provision for this problem is provided through the proposed legislation. Speaking as one who has long and ardently sought peace in industry, I look upon this legislation with the hope that it will bring stability of wage and price in harmony with each other and more uniform within the industry as a whole, and lead to the true conservation of this great natural resource.

We need peace in industry, especially in the coal-mining industry, and if this legislation be administered in a practical way by a nonpartisan commission, working in the interest of all the various elements which constitute public responsibility in this matter, it should usher in better days for the entire Nation.

CROP INSURANCE

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill (S. 1397) to create a Federal Crop Insurance Corporation, and for other purposes.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, one must be bold indeed to venture to speak on a subject so commonplace as crop insurance, as in my opinion we are all suffering from an emotional state of sensitivity. I shall make the venture for a few moments because I have long been an advocate of crop insurance.

I listened with much interest to the impressive and able statement made by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. POPE] during the legislative session last Thursday in explanation of the provisions of the bill. The complaints which may be urged against a plan of this kind and its objectives may be based upon the theory that it is projecting the Government into business. More and more I advocate the freedom of private initiative; more and more I oppose the Government entering into business in competition with the individual. I made this very clear a few years ago when I made a study of the subject as chairman of a select committee appointed by President Harding. At that time Mr. Henry A. Wallace, father of the present Secretary of Agriculture, was Secretary of Agriculture, an able advocate of farm measures and sympathetic toward agricultural problems. I had a number of conferences with him touching this important subject. As a result of those conferences I introduced in the Senate a resolution calling for the appointment of a select committee. In September 1922 the committee held hearings for nearly 2 weeks. The hearings were printed.

I proposed a measure which met the approval of the then Secretary of Agriculture and which simply provided an appropriation adequate to carry on a study of crop insurance in its application to the rural communities of our country.

It did not attempt to set up a machine to carry out the purposes of crop insurance. It simply provided for the collection of data on the theory that when the data were collected some further steps might be taken to aid cooperative farm organizations and old-line mutual companies to take up the matter of the issuance of some form of farm insurance policies.

I reintroduced the bill during each subsequent session until this year. In 1933 I reintroduced the bill, and the present Secretary of Agriculture, a brave and able son of Henry A. Wallace, who was Secretary of Agriculture under Mr. Harding, disapproved the bill. I felt somewhat disconsolate that one so able and sympathetic did not entertain the view which I thought the farmers of the country had with respect to such legislation.

During the last campaign, which I recall very vividly, the President of the United States and his opponent, Governor Landon, both advocated crop insurance. That was the first time the subject had emerged since the hearings held 15 years earlier. I am happy to say the conception of this splendid idea had its inception in a Republican administration and is now about to be carried to fruition in a Democratic administration, which after all probably makes it a nonpartisan proposition.

Of course, the objection that is urged, and quite properly urged, to this plan is that it does in a way lead the Government into business. I wish that were avoidable. I thought, and I still entertain the view—which I held very, very stoutly and with much conviction years ago—that the whole matter could be handled by mutual farm organizations. All they needed, in my opinion, was sufficient data with which to build up a structure which the farmers themselves might conduct and operate for their mutual benefit, in order to give them some reimbursement for losses for which they were not responsible. However, I was not in control of the situation, and the first I heard of this bill was during the present session; and recently I have had an opportunity to read the hearings.

I believe that with the $100,000,000 which is authorized to be appropriated in the bill, and the machinery which is to be set up under it, while the project is experimental in nature, it will demonstrate the feasibility and practicability of crop insurance. I entertain the view that at no distant date the farmers of the country, organized as they will be with this model before them, will carry on crop insurance without any interference, molestation, or intrusion by Government officials. I have no patience with the Government entering a business which otherwise would be entered by private industry.

Under the bill, as I conceive it, the Government will supply the financial aid and the machinery. The processes and the operation will be largely carried on by the farm producers. Of course, it is possible, though not likely, that the Government will lose all of the indemnity sum of $100,000,000 which is to constitute the capital stock to be taken from the Treasury of the United States. I think my able colleague from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], in the discussion he had earlier today with the Senator in charge of the bill, was told that that matter will be largely covered by an amendment at the proper time; but the bill, as it will create a structure for agriculture, unquestionably will demonstrate to the farmers of the country that insurance of their crops is practicable.

When we criticize ventures of this kind—for this is only a venture; it is a beginning; it is a step forward in a program which ultimately will be taken over by the agrarian interests of the country—I sometimes think we must look into the future to determine its value, and the philosophy which underlies the plan, and the reason that prompts us to action. If I thought we were to organize another corporation for cotton, one for the great horticultural interests of the country, others for those who grow vegetables and other basic commodities, in view of the large number of these groups and the amount of money involved in the Government's projection into this business, I should oppose this measure. I am supporting it today because it is an initial step in a great plan which, if carried out, in my opinion, will take away the necessity for Congress appropriating money for what we call farm benefits.

I opposed the last A. A. A. plan. I thought it was an imitation of an earlier plan, though called by a different name, namely, the one dealing with land erosion. I thought it collided with particular violence with the decision of the Supreme Court as announced by Mr. Justice Roberts. I now think so. I desire to see the Government handle the farming problem, if it is going to do anything on the subject, without making benefit payments from year to year. I believe that if crop insurance is carried out with the Government taking the initiative, and it proves successful, as I conceive will be the case, it will so stabilize income and prevent violent price fluctuations that benefits of any kind will not be necessary, such as we might have had under the old equalization fee, the debenture plan, or the domestic allotment plan, or the one we now have. It is for that reason that I frankly excuse myself for voting for this measure.

I wonder what any banker in this country would do if he did not carry insurance on the money in his vaults? What would a home owner do if he did not carry insurance on his home? What would the manufacturer do if he could not get insurance on his factories? There would be virtually no business whatsoever; yet the great agricultural group, comprising 35,000,000 people in this country, never has been able to stabilize its industry against losses that occur by paying for those losses in years when the crops are bountiful.

What I particularly like about this plan is that the farmer may pay his premium in wheat. If he chooses to pay it in cash, that is within his election; but in that event the board must in turn buy the equivalent in wheat. Consequently, we are dealing all the while with a farm product. That is an idea that was conceived by some genius. In all the studies I have heretofore made, we never considered that phase of the problem. It is new, unique, I think logical and fine; and I congratulate the chairman of the subcommittee, and the subcommittee itself, for bringing to the front that splendid idea of handling premiums and indemnities.

Mr. President, in September 1922 the Senate passed a resolution providing for the appointment of a select committee composed of three Senators to investigate the subject of crop insurance, particularly with reference to the kinds and costs of insurance now obtainable, the adequacy of the protection afforded by such insurance, the desirability of practical methods for extending the scope of such insurance, and the availability and sufficiency of statistics necessary properly and safely to issue additional crop insurance.

At the first meeting of the select committee I made the following observation:

> The chairman believes it important to state at the outset that the committee does not purpose to project the Federal Government into the business of writing crop insurance, a field of risk little known to insurance experts or companies doing an insurance business. Our efforts shall be directed toward a study of the hazards incident to this form of needed insurance with a view of collecting useful data and determining upon the feasibility of insurance of this character.
> For my own part, I believe the Department of Agriculture, through its various agencies which penetrate into most of the counties of the various States, can assist in the gathering of useful data and statistics which may justify private and mutual insurance companies selling crop insurance upon reasonable terms to the producers of the country, thereby assisting materially in the stabilization of agricultural production and credit.

The hearings on this important subject, and the study given thereto, find expression in several bills of similar character I introduced in the Senate authorizing and directing the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate all phases of crop insurance. One of these measures was passed by the Senate on May 23, 1930.

Mr. President, the risks and hazards confronting the farmer as a producer of crops are of two kinds; namely, those involved in the actual production or growing of crops and which affect his yield, and those involved in marketing or the prices received. The marketing hazard, or the possibility of oversupply of a given crop, with resulting inadequate prices, may, of course, be said to be common to all forms of production, industrial as well as agricultural. In the case of the farmer, however, the marketing hazard resulting from possible oversupply assumes peculiar seriousness by reason of the large number of producing units or farms, the uncertainty of the yield, and the relatively long period involved in the production process.

It is in the actual production end, however, that farming stands peculiarly alone in the number and the seriousness of the hazards encountered. These hazards arise in large measure from the vagaries of the weather, as evidenced in droughts, excessive moisture, floods, frost, hail, hot winds, and severe storms, each affecting larger or smaller areas. In addition, there are the hazards of crop disease, insect and animal pests. While disease and pests can to some extent be guarded against by individual or community action, neither the farmer nor anyone else is in position to control the weather.

From the point of view of dependence upon the weather, the occupation of the farmer as a grower of crops has but one parallel among the various occupations of men, and this is that of ocean commerce. Even in the shipping industry, however, we have to go back to the days of smaller sailing vessels in order to find a degree of dependence upon weather comparable to that involved in crop production.

Property insurance may be said to have been invented primarily to assist in distributing the risks involved in "trading at sea", marine insurance being older than fire insurance. While the principles of insurance were first applied to the hazards of the weather in connection with ocean commerce, these principles have not yet been effectively applied to the hazards involved in the growing of crops. The farmer is still in large measure forced to bear unaided by insurance the risks and hazards to his growing crops both from the weather and from other natural agencies. In fact, the farmer has occasionally been referred to as the greatest gambler in the world. The risks he assumes in crop production are not, strictly speaking, gambling risks, since they are not self-created but are inherent in a necessary human activity. There is no good reason why, with proper effort and care, insurance principles should not be applied to these crop-production risks, just as these principles have been applied to the risks or hazards of shipping and are now being applied to industrial risks of nearly every nature and form.

The manufacturer or merchant insures his plant against fire and windstorm. His plate glass is protected against breakage and his business and income are protected by use and occupancy insurance. He may, if he desires, protect himself against loss or damage from burglary, from explosion, from earthquake, and from riot and civil commotion. He can, and very generally does, protect himself against liability for accidents or injuries to any of his employees, as well as against liability for injury to the public resulting from his property or his use thereof. He may even insure himself by a special contract against excessive losses on his credits. Only in the case of farm crops is the producer forced to carry unaided the risk of loss from agencies over which he has absolutely no control.

By reason of the favorable or adverse action of the weather or other natural agencies, the yield of a given crop, even for the best of farmers, is subject to a range varying from a bumper yield to absolutely nothing. In the better agricultural sections crop failures even on individual farms are, of course, relatively rare; but they nevertheless do occur, and in the absence of insurance no farmer is certain that his investment in a given crop, consisting of accumulated capital and current labor, will not be a total loss. In less favored sections failures of crops on individual farms are relatively numerous, and these failures are strongly reflected in averages for counties or other given areas. Figures for the annual average yield on a county basis are at present not generally available. But one of the virtues of the pending plan is the gathering of further data which will result in extending more uniformly the contract of insurance throughout the farm areas of the country.

Mr. President, it is by no means contended that the insurance of growing crops against loss or damage from the weather or from other natural causes is a simple or easy matter, but many of the other forms of insurance already in use involve difficulties perhaps quite as complex, and there is little reason to assume that the problems involved in real crop insurance could not be solved if the proper effort were made.

Two quite distinct attempts have been made to provide the farmer with real protection in his business of growing crops. The first of these was made in North and South Dakota and Montana in 1917, when three different insurance companies offered such insurance and actually wrote it in considerable amounts. This attempt, however, resulted in heavy losses to the companies by reason of their limiting themselves to a relatively small territory, the entire area of which was affected by drought. Other difficulties besides those of too restricted territorial limits to the operations contributed to the unsatisfactory results. A proper preliminary study of the problems involved in crop insurance should seemingly have avoided the difficulties encountered.

The only criticism I am making of the pending plan at this time is that I am afraid that the data which have been collected are not quite sufficient to afford a base for the premium suggested in the bill.

The second real attempt to provide the farmer with crop insurance was made in 1920. This attempt also proved highly unsatisfactory and expensive to the insurance organization involved. The insurance contract in this second attempt covered prices as well as yield, and the year chosen for the introduction of this contract proved to be the worst one that could have been selected during the last half century. Prices were abnormally high when the contracts were written in the winter and spring of 1920, and the drop in prices before harvest time was almost unprecedented.

Neither of these two attempts of crop insurance prove that such insurance is not practical. They do tend to prove, however, the need for careful studies of crop hazards and risks, including all forms of moral hazards that may be involved in a program of crop insurance.

Aside from the nature and form of the contract itself, one of the first steps in providing a contract of crop insurance is the determination of fair and adequate rates for the protection offered based on the risks and hazards involved to each given crop in every locality where business is to be written.

As stated here Friday, I fear that unless the contract covers a general area, all producing wheat, the difference between the cost of the premiums in one State or portion of a State compared with another State or portion thereof or section of the country may bring about a situation which will give some grief to the board and possibly be brought to the attention of the Congress. I think that view is shared by my eminent friend the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG].

Mr. President, the Department of Agriculture has for nearly 20 years been gathering information on damage to all the more important crops in every part of the country. These data have been summarized by States, but to be of special value they should be tabulated, summarized, and analyzed by smaller districts or by counties. Figures for actual yield of the various crops are also available in the Department's files, and these, too, should be compiled, summarized, and analyzed by counties or by designated smaller districts within which reasonable uniformity obtains.

All different forms of crop-insurance contracts hitherto tried and the experience thereunder should be carefully studied and analyzed with a view to determining and combining the more practical provisions and devising others where the need is found.

The only hazard to growing crops for which insurance is now generally available is that of hail. Taking the country as a whole, however, the hazard of hail is only a minor one as compared with those of deficient moisture, excessive moisture, frost, or insect pests. Since 1920 a limited amount of insurance has been written each year on fruit and truck crops in selected areas. A limited amount of insurance against frost or freeze damage only has also been written, particularly on citrus fruits and sugarcane. But with these minor exceptions a crop producer has had no insurance facilities open to him in reference to his crops except insurance against hail.

Mr. President, it is my belief the provisions of this bill lay the foundation for a thoroughly sound approach to the problem of crop insurance. Confessedly there is a present demand for the development of such form of insurance throughout the rural sections of the country. If general crop insurance were available on reasonable terms, it would minimize to a marked degree the present hazards in the business of farming, and would contribute materially to the success, security, and stabilization of those engaged in agriculture.

The question may be raised during the debate—and intimations along that line have already been made—that this great work should be carried on by private companies. I recall that when the hearings were had 15 years ago, to which I referred some moments ago, several insurance companies had their officials present, and they all testified that they would contribute as much as they could, and would cooperate in every way if the Government would take the first step in initiating a contract of insurance with the crop producers of the country. So it is my opinion that, inasmuch as this field has never been entered, inasmuch as it is not an inviting one because the data are not sufficient, the insurance companies of the country will invite this legislation and will be happy indeed if the Government will demonstrate the practicability of entering the field, and I have every hope and confidence that private industry and mutual associations will take up the load and carry it through.

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, in answer to certain questions which were asked on Thursday as to the specific method of arriving at the premiums, I desire to have included in the RECORD as a part of my remarks certain charts, tables, and calculations which have been prepared.

One chart has to do with the premium rate in relation to the yield per acre, showing how it would work out in a number of instances. I ask that this chart be made a part of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be inserted in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMORANDUM ON PREMIUM RATES IN RELATION TO YIELDS PER ACRE

Premium rates depend upon the extent to which annual yields fall below the average yield. Thus, in illustrations 2 and 3 that follow, examples are given of two farms each with an average yield of 12 bushels per acre, but with annual premium rates varying from 0.42 of a bushel per acre in example no. 2 to 2½ bushels per acre in example no. 3. It is also noticeable that with a yield of only 8 bushels per acre in illustration no. 1 the premium rate is 1⅙ bushels per acre, compared with 2½ bushels in illustration no. 3. It is variability in yields and not the size of the average yield that determines the premium rate. It is coverage, or amount of insurance obtainable, that is determined by size of the average yield.

In illustration no. 3 the insurance corporation would have had to pay out in indemnities during the 6-year period 18 bushels per acre. In illustration no. 2 it would have had to pay out only 2 bushels per acre, or one-ninth as much.

In illustration no. 4 is an example of a farm with an average yield of 20 bushels per acre. This permits of a coverage of 15 bushels per acre under the 75-percent plan. Considering the experience of this farm with variability in yields and the experience of the county in which it is located, the premium rate for this farm is one-third of a bushel, or approximately 0.3 of a bushel per acre per year for a coverage of 15 bushels per acre.

Thus because of less risk, the farm in illustration no. 4 can be insured an average yield of 15 bushels per acre for a premium rate of a little less than 30 percent of that paid in illustration no. 1 for a coverage of only 6 bushels per acre.

This approach to an individual rating system permits the low-risk and high-risk farms to obtain insurance according to their needs on practically an equal footing.

The following tables show for 15 individual farms in each of three widely scattered counties the differences between the amounts that would be paid in as premiums and the amounts that would be drawn as indemnities.

In the case of many farms the amounts are very similar. However, those who suffered the most severe losses during the 6-year period paid in somewhat less than they drew out. Those who had small losses paid more in premiums than they drew out. This is due to the effect of using in part the county average to determine the premiums. The same thing happens in fire insurance, hail insurance, and other kinds of insurance. It is justified in this plan for crop insurance in that the record of the losses for the past 6 years will not be an exact picture of the losses for the future 6 years. Those who suffered biggest losses in 1930–35 will not necessarily have the biggest losses in 1938 and subsequent years.

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, a memorandum has been prepared showing the percentage of farms having wheat-yield losses in excess of 25 percent of the 6-year average yield. The question may be raised as to how many farms in a certain section produce less than, we will say, 75 percent of the average yield during the 6-year period. A number of calculations have been made showing that. I ask that these data be included in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMORANDUM ON THE PERCENTAGE OF FARMS HAVING WHEAT-YIELD LOSSES IN EXCESS OF 25 PERCENT OF THEIR 6-YEAR AVERAGE YIELD

In illustration no. 1 following it will be noted that in some of the low-risk counties such as Dickinson County, Kans.; Noble County, Okla.; and Columbia County, Pa., there were from 30 to 40 percent of the farms that suffered no loss in excess of 25 percent of their average yield in any of the 6 years 1930 to 1935, inclusive. That does not mean that they may not suffer such losses in the future but it does mean the risk is small and consequently the premium rate for such farms is the lowest.

On the other hand it will be noted that in such higher-risk counties as Haskell County, Kans.; Texas County, Okla.; and Adams County, N. Dak., from approximately 75 percent to 100 percent of the farms had wheat-yield losses in excess of 25 percent of their average yield in 3 to 5 years out of the 6. Naturally because of this increased frequency of probable claims as well as the size of them, it is necessary to maintain higher premium rates for such counties.

Illustrations 2 and 3 show what happens by years under a 75-percent plan of coverage and under a 50-percent plan.

In the case of Haskell County, Kans., it may be noted that while insuring only 50 percent of the average yield instead of 75 percent lowers the premium rate somewhat because it reduces the amount of indemnity due, it does not materially reduce the probable number of claims.

In the case of Dickinson County, Kans., on the other hand, insuring only 50 percent of the average yield instead of 75 percent materially reduces the premium rate not only by lowering the amount of indemnity due, but also by very materially affecting the possible number of claims.

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, some interest was expressed in the matter of the difference in premium rates on a 50-percent coverage basis and a 75-percent coverage basis. I stated on Thursday, I believe, that the premiums on a 50-percent basis would be half or less than half the premiums on a 75-percent coverage basis, and a more careful examination of the data shows that that statement is fairly accurate. However, it will vary from 11 percent to as high as 98 percent, according to different localities.

The table I have also shows that the statement I made the other day, that the variation of rates depends upon the variability of yield and not upon the amount of yield or the productivity of the land, was accurate. In other words, there may be a small average yield with great variability and the premium would be fairly high, whereas we may have a very large yield with a fairly uniform production over a period of years and the premium would be low. That is shown accurately and carefully in a number of instances in the chart which I have in my hand, and I will ask that that be made a part of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the chart was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMORANDUM ON THE EXTENT TO WHICH THE 50-PERCENT PLAN OF COVERAGE REDUCES THE PREMIUM RATE FROM THAT NECESSARY UNDER THE 75-PERCENT PLAN OF COVERAGE

The 50-percent plan of coverage as compared with the 75-percent plan reduces the premium rate for typical counties shown in the following table from approximately 40 to 98 percent, depending upon the area.

The table shows the premium rate under the 50-percent plan of coverage in percentage of the premium rate under the 75-percent plan of coverage. As an instance for the second State listed, Pennsylvania, the premium rate for Lancaster County under the 50-percent coverage plan would be only about 12 percent as large as the rate under the 75-percent plan. On the other hand, for Haskell County, Kans., the rate under the 50-percent plan would be approximately 62 percent of the rate under the 75-percent plan.

The extent of the reduction in rate under the 50-percent plan, as compared with the 75-percent plan, depends upon how much the lower coverage reduces the amount and frequency of loss claims to be paid.

Percentage that premium under 50-percent plan would be of the premium under the 75-percent plan

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, I have also had prepared a table showing the premium in percentage of insurance coverage, by counties, and what the premium would be in different representative sections of the country in percentage of the coverage in the different sections. I think this table will be of interest and value in considering this matter. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

These data are based on the original data for individual farms in the 6 years, 1930–35, adjusted to the 8-year period 1928–35. It is anticipated that data will be available in a few months to adjust the figures to the 10-year period 1926–35.

Mr. POPE. I also present a memorandum showing the approximate point at which premium rates for wheat will become prohibitive.

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMORANDUM ON APPROXIMATE POINT AT WHICH PREMIUM RATES FOR WHEAT WILL BECOME PROHIBITIVE

The point at which premium rates become prohibitive is that point at which they take such a large proportion of the coverage or amount of insurance extended, that the farmer is unable to continue farming with the balance left to work with. Where such a situation exists, the land in question is uninsurable for wheat-growing purposes.

Important published reports on crop insurance in both the United States and Canada have been in agreement on the point that the indemnity for total loss of the wheat crop should be around $4 to $6 an acre.

As a matter of actual experience, the private attempt at crop insurance in 1899 provided for an average coverage of $5 an acre. The private attempt in 1917 provided $7 an acre coverage. In the 1920–21 attempt at crop insurance the Hartford Co. finally set a $10 an acre limit. The Agricultural Protective Mutual Insurance Co. of Kansas operating in 1931 and 1932 sold policies in which the coverage ranged up to $8.35 an acre in 1931 and to $7.58 an acre in 1932. This company went into receivership after 1932, but in recent months has been reorganized.

In the Preliminary Report of the Committee on Crop Insurance of the Department of Agriculture, Regina, Sask., coverages for wheat are suggested ranging from $3.84 an acre to $6.06 an acre.

It is well known that risks and therefore premium rates will be highest in the Great Plain area where yields per acre, except in irrigated sections, average low. Experience with rates in this region indicate that in order for the farmer to have a net indemnity somewhere near the ranges indicated, wheat yields of 8 to 12 bushels an acre and not less than 6 are necessary. This is assuming 75 cents to $1 wheat and premium rates ranging from 1 to 3 bushels per acre per year for 75 percent coverage or one-half to 1½ bushels per acre for 50 percent coverage. In general it appears that the premium rate can hardly take more than one-fourth to one-third of the coverage in the high risk areas without becoming prohibitive.

Yields, coverage, and premium rates in relation to minimum indemnity requirements

Average yield per acre	Coverage 75 percent per acre	Premium per acre	Net coverage per acre	With $1 wheat	With 75-cent wheat

[1] This is merely for illustration.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. POPE. I yield.

Mr. KING. I wish to ask the Senator his interpretation of a phrase he used with regard to variability. I have in mind, as doubtless the Senator has in mind, the dry farms of this section and of sections in the West. Sometimes the yield may be 4 or 5 bushels to the acre and sometimes 10, 15, or 20 bushels to the acre. There is no certainty one year with another, or in any series of years compared with another series of years. What would be the basis on which to determine the premium to be paid?

Mr. POPE. As shown by the chart I have just put into the RECORD, there might be cases where the yield would be nothing in one year, and in another year it might be as high as 20, 25, or 30 bushels per acre. Over a period of years, with data available as to annual yields, it would be a matter of calculation to determine what the average yield would be. It has been assumed that perhaps a 10-year period would be taken as the basis for determining the average yield. If the data are available, it is merely a matter of calculation to determine the average yield.

As I explained before, it is not the average yield which will be insured, but a certain percent coverage of the average yield. There may be two policies, one, let us say, for 50 percent of the average yield, and another for 75 percent of the average yield. A farmer may have the option to take either of those policies. The amount of premiums, as I have already indicated, of course, would depend on the form of policy that the farmer took.

Mr. KING. Would it require, then, the setting-up of such machinery as to ascertain in advance, let us say, at the beginning of the year, or, with respect to winter wheat, in the fall, the probable acreage that A or B or C in a given section would seed, and a determination as to the possibility or probability of the yield per acre upon the land so cultivated?

Mr. POPE. No. The amount of acreage is not a matter to be determined by the board or the corporation. The premiums will be determined at the beginning of the year and will be based not upon any guess or estimate of what the probable yield will be, but upon the history of the particular farm, what it has actually produced in the past over the period of, say, 10 years, and also the record of production of farms in the locality. Some weight will be given to both factors in determining the average yield. Then the premiums will be determined from the average yield, and coverage of the average yield will be adopted.

Mr. KING. Then the agency that has charge of this work would have to ascertain for a number of years the number of acres and the yield, whether the land had been summerfallowed, whether 1 year it had been devoted to wheat, another to alfalfa, or to beets, or to some other crop; and from that information or data, much of which would be purely speculative, and very little, it seems to me, based upon facts that would be worthy of consideration in determining the premiums to be paid—a premium would be fixed accordingly?

Mr. POPE. Very complete data are available in some of the States. In North Dakota and Kansas, for 25 years, accurate data have been kept as to individual farms. For the past 6 years, since the Agricultural Adjustment Act went into operation, very accurate data are available for individual farm production. The crop estimates which are obtained by the Department of Agriculture are not of very much help, because they are based upon estimates generally in the county; but the data obtained under the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, and the data that have been obtained by a number of the States, are very accurate. Satisfactory data are obtainable as to most of the States during the past few years. The result is that we do not have something based on guess or estimate. In the main it is a determination from accurate data now available as to the principal crops that were included in the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the facts are so accurate, so susceptible of demonstration, why was there a failure of the efforts which have been made in North Dakota or elsewhere which were alluded to a moment ago by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY]? In spite of the fact that those who wrote the premiums supervised the examination of the farms and were there to witness their development, and so on, yet their efforts resulted in failure.

Mr. POPE. Does the Senator mean the efforts of private insurance companies?

Mr. KING. Yes. Why were they not continued?

Mr. POPE. There were two or three reasons for that. In the first place, in the case of the private efforts, it happened I think each time, as pointed out by the Senator from Oregon, that the losses during the first year or two of operation were very heavy. No provision was made for continuing the effort over a period of years so as to balance up, and the companies withdrew from the field after a year or two of serious losses. It is provided in this bill that a reserve appropriation shall be made to take care of such losses as may occur during the first 1 or 2 or 3 years of the operation of the provisions of this bill in order that the measure may be in operation long enough to work out a satisfactory plan of insurance. The private companies withdrew from the field when they suffered one or two serious losses.

Another thing pointed out by the representatives of the insurance companies themselves was that they did not have enough capital to spread the risk over a broad enough territory. Interestingly enough, the representatives of these companies, including the Hartford insurance companies, were themselves in favor of such a program as this, because they realized that private capital was not able to undertake a program as large as this ought to be in order to be successful.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator think there will be a loss of $100,000,000 in this experiment? If he does not think it will be so great, why make so large an appropriation?

Mr. POPE. I do not think there will be any loss. It is very unlikely that there will be 2 or 3 dry years such as have been experienced in the last few years. Such years are very unusual. No one can tell, of course; but it is entirely likely that there will be a more normal production during the next few years. If there is a normal production of wheat, no part of this fund will be drawn upon for the purpose of paying indemnities. If there are heavy losses during the first few years of operation, some money will be available with which the Government may pay the indemnities; and then at a later time, when normal production returns, or when large yields are realized, the money can be replaced.

It is not our purpose to expend this $100,000,000, or to throw it into this experiment without any opportunity of reimbursement. As I pointed out earlier in the day, the same thing is done that was done when war-risk insurance was put into operation. Fifty thousand dollars was made available for reserve, but from the very beginning the premiums exceeded the indemnities; so at the conclusion of that experiment, the Government had made $17,000,000 profit, and not one dollar of the $50,000 was ever drawn or used in the operation of the fund by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance.

Mr. KING. The Senator is referring to what I recall as being the insurance of cargoes sent across the sea?

Mr. POPE. Yes; I am referring to war-risk insurance—insurance of the hulls and cargoes of ships.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho, in answer to the question of the Senator from Utah as to the reason for the failures of the private insurance companies, if it is not true that they not only insured the crop itself but insured the price of the crop, and it happened that in the years during which they were operating the prices went down, so that they had to pay not only on the basis of loss of crop but on the basis of the reduction in price? There is nothing in this bill which provides for insurance against loss in price.

Mr. KING. Does not this bill impose a greater liability? The Corporation is compelled to take wheat if the insured does not pay cash. Then it must take care of the wheat. It must impound it. It must find markets for it. It must insure the wheat while it is in warehouses. So the bill entails additional obligations. It seems to me that if the work of this organization were limited to insurance, receiving cash for the premiums, and paying the losses when established, many difficulties would be avoided, and, in my opinion, many losses for which the Corporation would be compelled to pay if it were bound to take over the wheat, impound it, and find a market for it, as the bill contemplates.

Mr. POPE. I think the statement of the Senator shows a lack of understanding of the provisions of the bill. Last Thursday I attempted to explain quite fully the plan, and to show that the very thing would not happen which the Senator is now asserting would happen, because the wheat is taken at the current price in the event the farmer wishes to pay in cash, and held, and paid out to the farmer who suffers losses by way of indemnity; and in the event any cash should be paid to him it would be at the price of wheat at the time the indemnity was paid, so that the Government could not suffer any loss in connection with the operation.

It is true that the bill provides that the operating expenses shall be paid by the Government, and there is an authorization of an appropriation for that purpose. The reasons for that have been fully given several times in a discussion of the measure. If the Senator is not familiar with it, I will point out that during the last 10-year period the Government has paid out $615,000,000 for seed loans and feed loans and grants and drought relief, which is over $60,000,000 a year. Every witness who testified before the subcommittee stated that the enactment of the bill would very largely relieve the Government of the necessity of making appropriations for loans and grants such as I have mentioned. All those things have been gone into very carefully, and have been discussed very carefully on the floor, so that I think if the Senator understood the bill and its operations many of the questions in his mind would not have arisen.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I confess that I may not understand the bill; certainly I do not understand it in a way that makes me entirely satisfied with it. The Senator knows that I have been in attendance upon other committees and have been denied the pleasure of listening to his observations and, undoubtedly, his very excellent and accurate explanation of the workings and operations of the measure.

Because of the fact that he has lived with it and studied it and conferred with a large number of individuals, doubtless, who are very earnest in their efforts to secure its passage, he possesses a fund of information which I do not have and perhaps some of the other Senators who have been in attendance upon committees do not possess.

However, it seems to me, Mr. President, we are embarking under this bill upon an experiment—and I use the term advisedly. I do not think we have sufficient data in order to predicate a judgment as to the ultimate effect and operations of the bill. That it will incur losses, to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, it seems to me one does not have to have very great power of vision or perspicacity to perceive. I would feel much more satisfied with the measure if it did not entail the acquisition of wheat for any purpose and its holding and disposal. The Government becomes, therefore, a vendor and a vendee; it becomes a broker in the wheat market, a broker, perhaps, in the flour market, and assumes obligations and liabilities quite distinct from those of an insurance corporation.

I suppose the measure has the votes behind it and that any animadversions upon it would be utterly futile. I should like, however, to ask the Senator some questions. The Senate has not passed upon any of the amendments to the bill as yet, has it?

Mr. POPE. No.

Mr. KING. Then, I shall pretermit the questions I was about to ask until the amendments which have been suggested are under consideration.

Mr. President, I express a great deal of regret in having the Federal Government enter upon further activities in the field of private endeavor. I know that we are projecting the Federal Government into practically every field of endeavor, whether that endeavor be individual in character or corporate or community. There is scarcely any field in business that the Government is not entering. Under this policy of centralization of authority and the expansion of the activities of the Federal Government we shall soon have not a republic, not a dual form of government in which the States have functions and responsibilities, but we shall have State socialism; and the Federal Government will be the promoter of nearly every activity. It will be the godfather, the godmother, and the wet nurse of many of the activities which belong essentially to the States, to communities, and to individuals. I see no end of the long, long trail that leads from a proper individualism, with the benefits to be derived from the exercise and development of the abilities of the individual, to that goal where State socialism, with all the evils which are incident thereto, will have been realized. We are getting away from the moorings of the fathers and are embarking upon—I was about to say, experimental activities, but we are embarking upon a tempestuous sea that, in my judgment, will bring to us and to our children after us a great deal of grief and sorrow.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, in the course of the debate this morning the able Senator from Idaho [Mr. POPE] agreed that we should undertake to work out an amendment to section 3 which would make sure that the $100,000,000 cash fund should remain intact as a revolving fund and should be reimbursed only out of premiums and not out of subsequent appropriations. It is my understanding that the language which I am about to offer has the approval of the able Senator and his experts, and, since I must leave the floor, I am asking permission to offer now to amend the bill on page 2, at line 13, by adding the following sentence:

> Any impairment of the capital stock described in subsection (a) hereof shall be restored only out of operating profits of the corporation.

I offer that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SCHWELLENBACH in the chair). Is there objection to considering the amendment at this time?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Michigan a question. Is it his understanding that this $100,000,000 fund must be preserved indefinitely?

Mr. VANDENBERG. The purpose of the amendment is to see to it that it is preserved, and that if it is drawn down 1 year through excessive losses it shall be restored through premiums instead of through subsequent additional appropriations.

Mr. KING. Would that mean that the board, if they did their duty, would be required to increase the premiums for the coming years in order to reimburse the fund by reason of the losses which have been sustained?

Mr. VANDENBERG. It would mean that the average premium over the years would do precisely that thing.

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan is entirely satisfactory. I had understood and had construed the bill to provide for what the amendment contemplates, but since there is some doubt about it, I am perfectly willing to accept the amendment.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Michigan whether or not, in order to accomplish what he has in mind, there ought not to be in connection with the amount of the premiums some provision directing the organization which determines the premiums to fix them upon sound actuarial bases? I understand from the Senator from Idaho there have been extensive studies into the question of the losses that may occur. It seems to me that the board ought to be directed to fix its premiums so that in the ordinary course, following sound actuarial rules, the premiums would carry the losses, and that would then, if the actuarial figures and the statistics are correct, provide a fund for maintaining this capital fund.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think that would follow as a matter of course if the amendment should be adopted, for that is the mechanism which must proceed under the amendment.

Mr. POPE. That would be my interpretation of the effect of the amendment.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I ask for a vote on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 2, after line 13, it is proposed to insert the following:

Any impairment of the capital stock described in subsection (a) hereof shall be restored only out of operating profits of the corporation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, I now ask that the amendments of the committee be considered and disposed of prior to the offering of individual amendments from the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I wish to say a few words on the bill before the Senate proceeds to consider the amendments.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] raised the question as to why private companies have not succeeded in the handling of crop insurance. The principal reason why they have not done so is that the premiums for crop insurance have been so high as to make that kind of insurance prohibitive to the average farmer. We have had hail insurance in a number of States, which has been fairly successful, especially where it has been under State administration.

The Senator referred to the bill as socialistic, but that does not hurt my feelings at all. One may call it socialistic, or may call the whole plan socialistic if he desires, but the American farmer is entitled to some help from the States and from the Government, and this is a step in that direction.

We have talked a great deal about putting agriculture on a business basis. This is a step toward putting agriculture upon a sound business basis. The farmers will have enough to contend with even if they can have a little crop insurance. I think the farmers would be perfectly justified in asking for, and the Congress would be justified in passing, a bill providing that the losses be paid by the Government itself. The farmers produce the food products which the Nation must have in order to exist. They have been forced to sell their products below cost of production because the Congress has not protected them by giving them cost of production. Therefore it would be nothing out of the way if Congress should provide money out of the Federal Treasury to insure the crops of the farmers against loss. However, we are not asking for that.

The question has been studied for years. This special bill has been studied for many months and given very careful attention by experts in the Department of Agriculture, as well as by farm leaders and others interested in agriculture throughout the United States. We believe it is a good bill. It can be called experimental if desired. Of course, it is of the nature of an experiment, but we hope it will be successful and that it will lead to general crop insurance for the principal farm products. The farmers are entitled to insurance just as much as is industry, because they have not the means to protect themselves against losses, and accordingly the insurance provided by the bill will be a form of that kind of protection.

Someone has referred to the plan as a subsidy to the farmers. The farmers are not the only ones who will be getting a subsidy at the hands of the Government even if this insurance may properly be termed a "subsidy." We have given subsidies for years to manufacturing interests through high tariffs, to the railroad companies, to the shipping interests on the sea, and to other big industries. It would be nothing out of the way if the farmers should get a little subsidy, too, because they produce the commodities which the Nation must have in order to live. The farmers have been forced to sell their products below cost of production year after year. This bill will, as I have said, help the farmers to get on a business basis, and while it applies only to wheat, I believe the great majority of the wheat farmers throughout the Nation are in favor of the bill. I know many other farmers are hoping to have their products brought under similar provisions, and when this plan is tried out and found to be successful, I hope that may be done for the other leading farm products.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Committee amendments are in order, and the clerk will state the first amendment of the committee.

The first amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, in section 2, on page 1, line 10, after the word "created", to insert "as an agent of and within the Department of Agriculture", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. To carry out the purposes of this act, there is hereby created as an agency of and within the Department of Agriculture a body corporate with the name "Federal Crop Insurance Corporation" (herein called the corporation). The principal office of the corporation shall be located in the District of Columbia, but there may be established agencies or branch offices elsewhere in the United States under rules and regulations prescribed by the board of directors. This act may be cited as the Federal Crop Insurance Act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, paragraph (a), on page 2, line 11, after the word "shall", to insert "with the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture", so as to make the paragraph read:

SEC. 3. (a) The corporation shall have a capital stock of $100,000,000 subscribed by the United States of America, payment for which shall with the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture be subject to call in whole or in part by the board of directors of the corporation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, paragraph (d), on page 4, line 7, after the word "injunction", to strike out "execution, or other" and insert "garnishment, or other similar", so as to make the paragraph read:

(d) Subject to the provisions of section 7 (c), may sue and be sued in its corporate name in any court of competent jurisdiction, State or Federal: Provided, That no attachment, injunction, garnishment, or other similar process, mesne or final, shall be issued against the corporation or its property.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, paragraph (f), on page 4, line 15, after the words "as the", to strike out "executive departments" and insert "other executive agencies", so as to make the paragraph read:

(f) shall be entitled to the free use of the United States mails in the same manner as the other executive agencies of the Government;

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, paragraph (i), on page 5, line 1, after the word "determine", to strike out "its necessary" and insert "the character and necessity for its", so as to make the paragraph read:

(i) shall determine the character and necessity for its expenditures under this act and the manner in which they shall be incurred, allowed, and paid, without regard to the provisions of any other laws governing the expenditure of public funds, and such determinations shall be final and conclusive upon all other officers of the Government; and

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 6, on page 5, line 12, to strike out paragraph (a) and insert in lieu thereof a new paragraph (a), as follows:

SEC. 6. (a) The Secretary shall appoint, in accordance with the provisions of the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, such officers and employees as may be necessary for the transaction of the business of the corporation, which appointments may be made without regard to the civil-service rules and regulations, fix their compensation, define their authority and duties, delegate to them such of the powers vested in the corporation as it may determine, require bond of such of them as he may designate, and fix the penalties and pay the premiums of such bonds. The appointment of officials and the selection of employees by the Secretary shall be made only on the basis of merit and efficiency.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like an explanation from the Senator from Idaho [Mr. POPE] as to why this amendment is proposed. If I understand it correctly, it seems to take employees out of the Classification Act and give to the Secretary additional authority than that which he would otherwise exercise under section 6.

Mr. POPE. The Senator will observe the amendment does not take the employees and officials out of the Classification Act. It expressly puts them under the Classification Act of 1923 as amended.

Mr. KING. What is the purpose of the amendment?

Mr. POPE. The purpose of the amendment is to take from the civil-service regulations employees who would have been included under the original bill. The reason for that, as I have explained several times today, is that we found about 75 percent of the employees who would come under the bill are warehousemen, laborers, appraisers, inspectors, adjusters, and the kind of employment which does not lend itself to civil-service rules and regulations. Therefore, it seemed better to take them out of the civil-service regulations and leave them under the Classification Act, and then insert a provision requiring that their appointment shall be made only on the basis of their efficiency.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, in section 6, paragraph (d), on page 7, to strike out lines 4 to 8, as follows:

(d) The board may allot to the bureaus and offices of the Department of Agriculture or transfer to such other agencies of the Federal and State Governments as it may request to assist in carrying out this act any funds available for the purposes of this act.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

(d) The Secretary of Agriculture may allot to bureaus and offices of the Department of Agriculture or transfer to such other agencies of the State and Federal Governments as he may request to assist in carrying out this act any funds made available pursuant to the provisions of section 15 of this act.

(e) In carrying out the provisions of this act the board may, in its discretion, utilize producer-owned and producer-controlled cooperative associations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 7, paragraph (a), on page 7, line 24, before the word "drought", to insert "unavoidable causes including", and in line 25, after the word "wind", to insert "winterkill, lightning", so as to make the paragraph read:

SEC. 7. To carry out the purposes of this act the corporation is authorized and empowered—

(a) Commencing with the wheat crop planted for harvest in 1938, to insure, upon such terms and conditions not inconsistent with the provisions of this act as it may determine, producers of wheat against loss in yields of wheat due to unavoidable causes including drought, flood, hail, wind, winterkill, lightning, tornado, insect infestation, plant disease, and such other causes as may be determined by the board. Such insurance shall not cover losses due to the neglect or malfeasance of the producer. Such insurance shall cover a percentage, to be determined by the board, of the recorded or appraised average yield of wheat on the insured farm for a representative base period subject to such adjustments as the board may prescribe to the end that the average yields fixed for farms in the same area which are subject to the same conditions may be fair and just. The board may condition the issuance of such insurance in any county or area upon a minimum amount of participation in a program of crop insurance formulated pursuant to this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 7, page 9, line 18, after the word "replace", to insert "promptly", and in line 21, after the word "deterioration", to insert "Provided, however, That nothing in this section shall prevent prompt offset purchases and sales of wheat for convenience in handling. The restriction on the purchase and sale of wheat provided in this section shall be made a part of any crop-insurance agreement made under this act. Notwithstanding any provision of this act, there shall be no limitation upon the legal or equitable remedies available to the insured to enforce against the corporation the foregoing restriction with respect to purchases and sales of wheat", so as to make the paragraph read:

(d) From time to time, in such manner and through such agencies as the Board may determine, to purchase, handle, store, insure, provide storage facilities for, and sell wheat, and pay any expenses incidental thereto, it being the intent of this provision, however, that, insofar as practicable, the corporation shall purchase wheat only at the rate and to a total amount equal to the payment of premiums in cash by farmers or to replace promptly wheat sold to prevent deterioration; and shall sell wheat only to the extent necessary to cover payments of indemnities and to prevent deterioration: Provided, however, That nothing in this section shall prevent prompt offset purchases and sales of wheat for convenience in handling. The restriction on the purchase and sale of wheat provided in this section shall be made a part of any crop insurance agreement made under this act. Notwithstanding any provision of this act, there shall be no limitation upon the legal or equitable remedies available to the insured to enforce against the corporation the foregoing restriction with respect to purchases and sales of wheat. Wheat acquired under the provisions of this act shall be kept in federally bonded or State licensed warehouses or in such other manner as the Board determines will adequately protect the interests of the Corporation and the producers insured.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 10, after line 15, to strike out:

SEC. 9. All money of the corporation not otherwise employed may be deposited with the Treasurer of the United States, in any Federal Reserve bank, or in any other bank approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, subject to withdrawal by the corporation at any time, or may be invested in obligations of the United States. The Federal Reserve banks are hereby authorized and directed to act as depositories, custodians, and fiscal agents for the corporation in the performance of its powers conferred by this act.

And to insert:

SEC. 9. All money of the corporation not otherwise employed may be deposited with the Treasurer of the United States or in any bank approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, subject to withdrawal by the corporation at any time, or with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury may be invested in obligations of the United States. Subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Federal Reserve banks are hereby authorized and directed to act as depositories, custodians, and fiscal agents for the corporation in the performance of its powers conferred by this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 12, page 12, line 4, after the word "corporation", to strike out "The financial transactions of the corporation shall be audited by the General Accounting Office at such times and in such manner as the Comptroller General of the United States may prescribe for the sole purpose of making a report to Congress, together with such recommendations as he may deem advisable" and to insert "The financial transactions of the corporation shall be audited at least once each year by the General Accounting Office for the sole purpose of making a report to Congress, together with such recommendations as the Comptroller General of the United States may deem advisable: Provided, That such report shall not be made until the corporation shall have had reasonable opportunity to examine the exceptions and criticisms of the Comptroller General or the General Accounting Office, to point out errors therein, explain or answer the same, and to file a statement which shall be submitted by the Comptroller General with his report", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 12. The corporation shall at all times maintain complete and accurate books of account and shall file annually with the Secretary of Agriculture a complete report as to the business of the corporation. The financial transactions of the corporation shall be audited at least once each year by the General Accounting Office for the sole purpose of making a report to Congress, together with such recommendations as the Comptroller General of the United States may deem advisable: Provided, That such report shall not be made until the corporation shall have had reasonable opportunity to examine the exceptions and criticisms of the Comptroller General or the General Accounting Office, to point out errors therein, explain or answer the same, and to file a statement which shall be submitted by the Comptroller General with his report.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, after line 10, to strike out:

SEC. 15. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated and made available to the corporation such sums, not in excess of $10,000,000 for any fiscal year, as may be necessary to cover the operating and administrative costs of the corporation other than payments of claims for indemnities.

And to insert:

SEC. 15. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums, not in excess of $10,000,000 for any fiscal year, as may be necessary to cover the operating and administrative costs of the corporation, other than payments of claims for indemnities, which shall be allotted to the corporation in such amounts and at such time or times as the Secretary of Agriculture may determine.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator in charge of the bill a question in regard to this amendment.

From statements which have been made by the Senator from Idaho [Mr POPE] and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG,] I received the impression that $10,000,000 is all that will be necessary in any one year for operating and administrative costs. It seems to me the pending amendment will authorize a larger sum than $10,000,000 to be paid upon the request of the Secretary of Agriculture. What limitations are there?

Mr. POPE. Of course the appropriation will be made by Congress, and I assume that an appropriation not in excess of $10,000,000 will be made. I think perhaps this particular language was used as a limitation, so that if $10,000,000 should not be necessary, that much need not be used. It may be that it need not be appropriated; but the appropriation of an amount not in excess of $10,000,000 in any fiscal year is authorized in this section.

Mr. KING. What is meant by the words "other than payments of claims for indemnities"? They might aggregate an amount in excess of $10,000,000.

Mr. POPE. No; that language simply means that the $10,000,000 is to be used for the payment of operating and administrative costs, but is not to be used for the payment of indemnities.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator understand that this is a ceiling beyond which no appropriation is authorized?

Mr. POPE. Yes; that $10,000,000 is the maximum appropriation that may be made.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. POPE. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. I understand the theory of the bill to be that the premiums will take care of all indemnities paid because of losses incurred.

Mr. POPE. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. And that the $10,000,000 which is the maximum of authorization could not be exceeded in any future fiscal year by an appropriation of Congress, because no other amount would be authorized.

Mr. POPE. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. And, of course, in any year when the losses might exceed the premiums, if the capital stock were invaded to any extent under the amendment already agreed to, it would be reimbursed out of future premiums.

Mr. POPE. Yes.

I may also say to the Senator something which I think has not been said before. There is in the bill a provision authorizing the board to load on to the premiums the expenses of local committees in the various counties and States. It is estimated that those expenses will be about $2,000,000 annually, so that in time those expenses may be borne by the premiums or by the growers themselves, which would tend to reduce the amount which is authorized to be appropriated annually to $8,000,000 or less.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee inserting a new section 15 in lieu of the one printed in the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That completes the committee amendments.

Mr. MALONEY obtained the floor.

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, I promised one or two Senators that when the committee amendments were concluded I should ask for a quorum call, in order that they might present certain amendments which they have in mind. Therefore, if the Senator from Connecticut will yield for that purpose, I will suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield for the purpose of a quorum call?

Mr. MALONEY. I yield.

Mr. POPE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Connally	King	Pepper
Andrews	Davis	Lee	Pittman
Ashurst	Dieterich	Lewis	Pope
Austin	Duffy	Lodge	Radcliffe
Bachman	Ellender	Logan	Reynolds
Bankhead	Frazier	Lonergan	Robinson
Barkley	George	Lundeen	Russell
Bilbo	Gerry	McAdoo	Schwartz
Bone	Gibson	McCarran	Schwellenbach
Borah	Green	McGill	Sheppard
Brown, Mich.	Guffey	McKellar	Steiwer
Brown, N. H.	Hale	McNary	Thomas, Okla.
Bulkley	Harrison	Maloney	Thomas, Utah
Bulow	Hatch	Minton	Townsend
Burke	Hayden	Moore	Tydings
Byrd	Herring	Murray	Vandenberg
Byrnes	Hitchcock	Neely	Van Nuys
Capper	Holt	Norris	Wagner
Caraway	Hughes	Nye	Wheeler
Chavez	Johnson, Calif.	O'Mahoney	White
Clark	Johnson, Colo.	Overton

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-three Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, a little earlier in the afternoon I spoke briefly about the wisdom of changing the title of the corporation proposed to be created by this bill. I think perhaps the best argument that could be made in that connection was made just a few minutes ago by the able Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER].

The Senator from North Dakota is one of the best friends the farmers of the country have. He has an unusual understanding of the farmers' problems, and for a great many years he has been waging a fight in their behalf. During the course of his remarks the Senator said he felt that the farmers are entitled to receive from the Federal Government and the State governments some help. He talked about a subsidy for farmers, and he made it clear to me that he recognized that the bill makes provision for a subsidy for farmers, and that is the point I feebly tried to make earlier in the afternoon, that this was not truly an insurance proposal as we understand the word "insurance."

I have no desire to take much of the time of the Senate this late in the afternoon. I think that Senators have a fairly good understanding of this subject and the proposal, and of insurance, as well, and because this is really an equalization bill, because it is an experiment, because we cannot be certain that it will work, or that if it does work it will pay its way, I think we ought to be fair to the insurance companies and to the insurance business, and to the insurance agents of the country, and, while probably no great harm could come in this instance, because it is an experiment, I feel that it might lead to something more far reaching, at least to a more far-reaching proposal. I am therefore hopeful that the Senate will very seriously consider the amendment which I now offer, proposing to substitute in the title of the bill for the word "insurance" the word "equalization", and in section 2 of the bill, on page 2, line 2, to substitute for the word "insurance" the word "equalization."

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, this matter was discussed on the floor today, and was discussed before today, and I must oppose the amendment. The proposed legislation is very well known throughout the country as "crop insurance" legislation. It was referred to as such in the message of the President to this body. It has been so referred to in the report of the President's committee, which has been very widely distributed, and I can see no possible advantage to the private insurance companies or to anybody else in changing the word "insurance" to "equalization" or to some other word; therefore I oppose the amendment. I think it would do no good, and I think it would do some harm to the program of insurance as it is now generally understood throughout the Nation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, line 2, it is proposed to strike out the word "Insurance" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "Equalization."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I desire to say but a word upon the bill which the Senate is about to pass. I feel that we are taking a very important step today from the standpoint of American agriculture; that we are really laying a foundation upon which we hope to build a degree of stabilization for the agricultural industry.

The pending proposal is limited to wheat. Upon the success of the operation of the plan now before us much depends in connection with other agricultural commodities. Success for the plan as it affects the wheat farmer is certain to find Congress called upon and quite ready to afford the same advantage for producers of other agricultural commodities. I feel, therefore, that the success of this plan is imperative, and that if it is possible for Congress to guard carefully this step so as to assure its success, it will be but doing a duty which it owes to the people.

It seems to me much of the success of the plan is going to be dependent upon the base upon which insurance rates are determined. Excessive rates will be certain to destroy the plan after only a year or two of effort. In many of the Northwestern States during recent years the farmers have been seriously restricted and injured by reason of droughts. Taking more recent years of production as a base in determining insurance rates would be most unfair to some communities.

Mr. President, I have before me a table showing what might be expected normally through the great northwestern region. There has gone out the impression that droughts have become quite the order of things in that section. I should like to point out, however, that from the year 1900 to 1915, inclusive, there was a net rainfall of 15½ inches above normal. In the more recent years, from 1929 to and including 1936, a deficiency of approximately 27 inches was revealed. To base insurance rates upon production in the last 7 years would be quite unfair; and I rise to ask the Senator from Idaho if the bill in its present form in any wise restricts the Department of Agriculture in determining the years to be used as a base for fixing the rates of insurance.

Mr. POPE. It does not. The matter was discussed before the committee several times; and farmers, particularly from the State of North Dakota, brought very sharply to the attention of the committee the very question now raised by the Senator. They suggested that a sufficiently long period of time be taken as a base to make a fair determination so far as the farmers themselves were concerned; that the fact that from 1900 to 1927 or 1928 there was a fair amount of moisture and no drought should be taken into consideration along with the severe drought of the last few years. It is my understanding that the Department will take a period of 10 years or more as a base for arriving at the average yield.

Mr. NYE. And there is no restriction in the pending bill against the Department taking a longer period of years than 10 as its base?

Mr. POPE. There is not. I think that matter will be in the discretion of the Board, and I feel that the Board would be fair in taking a long enough period to make it fairly representative of the average yield, and the basis will be fair to farmers and to the Government.

Mr. NYE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, recalling the discussion earlier in the day, I offer an amendment on page 8, line 1, after the word "other", to insert the word "unavoidable."

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, I have no objection to the amendment, and therefore I will accept it. I think it adds to the value of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed, on page 8, line 1, after the word "other", to insert the word "unavoidable."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BILBO. Mr. President, I have the honor to represent in part the second largest cotton-growing State of the Union, and I am sure the cotton farmers are entitled to and would desire insurance against the same unavoidable causes, which sometimes make their crops a failure, as are set out in the bill in connection with the wheat producers.

In order to let the cotton farmers know that I have been diligent and on the job to protect their interests, I desire to state that I brought this matter to the attention of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, of which I am a member, because I am in sympathy with the bill and the general scheme. I believe it is the first great step we have taken in a decade to give security to the agricultural life of our country. I have the assurance of all those who are interested in the protection of the farmer provided by this measure that if this scheme shall prove to be a success, and our dream shall be realized, as soon as the necessary data can be secured by the Department of Agriculture, cotton—and not only cotton, but other staple crops—will enjoy the same benefits given to the wheat farmer by the provisions of this bill.

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, a few minutes ago the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] raised a question as to subsection (b) on page 8, and made the point that there was no requirement in the bill that premiums be levied which would provide adequate funds to take care of the indemnities that might be required. I agreed with him that in line 14, on page 8, following the word "fix", the word "adequate" should be inserted. That seemed entirely agreeable to the Senator from Utah, and is agreeable to me. Therefore I offer that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In subsection (b), on page 8, line 14, after the word "fix", it is proposed to insert the word "adequate", so as to make the subsection read:

(b) To fix adequate premiums for such insurance, payable either in wheat or cash equivalent as of the due date thereof, on the basis of the recorded or appraised average crop loss of wheat on the insured farm for a representative base period subject to such adjustments as the board may prescribe to the end that the premiums fixed for farms in the same area, which are subject to the same conditions, may be fair and just. Such premiums shall be collected at such time or times, in such manner, and upon such security as the board may determine.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open for further amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill be passed?

The bill (S. 1397) was passed.

REGULATION OF BITUMINOUS-COAL INDUSTRY

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 4985, to regulate interstate commerce in bituminous coal, and for other purposes, which is identical in purpose and almost identical in language with Senate bill 1, commonly known as the Guffey coal bill.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I have no objection to the bill becoming the unfinished business, but I should like to have some understanding with regard to its discussion and final disposal for the reason that I should not want, and I certainly should object to a vote on the bill being taken tomorrow, because of the absence of some Senators on this side who are interested in the measure.

Mr. BARKLEY. I will say to the Senator from Oregon that there is no plan to consider the bill this afternoon at all. It is proposed to take a recess very soon and it is not very likely that a vote on the bill will be reached tomorrow.

Mr. McNARY. That prediction is not quite satisfactory. I want it understood that this bill shall be made the unfinished business, and that a vote upon it shall not be taken earlier than Thursday.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, let me assure the Senator from Oregon that no effort will be made to obtain a final vote on the bill before Thursday. But, barring unexpected developments, we shall endeavor to pass the bill before the Senate adjourns that day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from West Virginia.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 4985) to regulate interstate commerce in bituminous coal, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Interstate Commerce with amendments.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from West Virginia a question. The Senator from West Virginia has moved to proceed to the consideration of the House bill?

Mr. NEELY. That is correct.

Mr. BORAH. Is the House bill identical with the bill which was favorably reported from the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the Senate?

Mr. NEELY. Subject to the amendments made by the Senate committee, the House bill was substituted for the so-called Guffey bill.

Mr. BORAH. The House bill is the same as the bill which was favorably reported by the Senate committee?

Mr. NEELY. The House bill is the one which the committee has reported and which is now before the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. The reason I ask the question is that I have been giving some attention to the bill which the Senate committee reported. I was wondering if it would be necessary now to go back over this bill in order to examine it in detail, or whether I could proceed upon the theory that it is substantially the same bill as that which was favorably reported by the committee.

Mr. NEELY. In my opinion, the Senator from Idaho can safely proceed upon that theory.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. BARKLEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported favorably the nomination of Floyd Sharp, of Arkansas, to be State administrator for Arkansas in the Works Progress Administration, vice W. R. Dyess, deceased.

He also, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SCHWELLENBACH in the chair). The reports will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

If there be no further reports of committees, the clerk will state the first nomination in order on the calendar.

IN THE ARMY

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Army.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I move that the nominations in the Army be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations in the Army are confirmed en bloc.

IN THE MARINE CORPS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Marine Corps.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask that the nominations in the Marine Corps be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations in the Marine Corps are confirmed en bloc.

That completes the Executive Calendar.

RECESS

The Senate resumed legislative session.

Mr. BARKLEY. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 48 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Wednesday, March 31, 1937, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, MARCH 30, 1937

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Again, O Lord God, we turn to Thee with gratitude and praise. Thou hast thrown the light of eternal morning on the Great Beyond; the dark gray ministry of the cloud is over and the crown of thorns is transformed into a garland of lilies. Verify Thy word unto us, our Father, for Thy word is truth; they that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength, they shall mount up with wings, they shall run and not be weary, they shall walk and not faint. Thy word is no vague counsel; help us not to miss its guiding truth; inspire us with the faith and zeal of the Master. Grant that the roots of all bitterness may be starved and strangled by the flowers of grace and the fruits of love. Give us the courage to overawe littleness by greatness, shame impurity by the beauty of holiness, and drive out sadness by the power of a great joy. Do Thou let the blessing of Almighty God rest upon our President, our Speaker, the Cabinet, and the two Houses of Congress. We earnestly pray that they may work in faith, wisdom, and cooperation. Let duties be performed with cheerfulness, lessons learned with humility, and crosses borne with patient hope. In the name of our Lord and Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 4720) entitled "An act making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and for other purposes", disagreed to by the House; agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. GLASS, Mr. MCKELLAR, Mr. TYDINGS, Mr. HAYDEN, and Mr. STEIWER to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 102. An act to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the seventy-fifth anniversary of the Battle of Antietam;

S. 451. An act for the relief of Farley J. Holloman;

S. 673. An act for the relief of S. T. Dickinson;

S. 790. An act to repeal section 13 of the act entitled "An act to regulate interstate and foreign commerce in petroleum and its products by prohibiting the shipment in such commerce of petroleum and its products produced in violation of State law, and for other purposes", approved February 22, 1935;

S. 812. An act for the relief of E. P. Conroy and Graham Conroy;

S. 893. An act for the relief of Jack Wade, Perry Shilton, Louie Hess, Owen Busch, and William W. McGregor;

S. 1077. An act to amend the act creating the Federal Trade Commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes;

S. 1081. An act for the relief of H. G. Carriere, Charles E. Livingston, and John Latham; and

S. J. Res. 64. Joint resolution defining the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims under the acts approved March 19, 1924 (43 Stat. 27), and April 25, 1932 (47 Stat. 137), and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the amendments of the House to a joint resolution of the Senate of the following title:

S. J. Res. 66. Joint resolution providing for the participation by the United States in the Greater Texas and Pan American Exposition to be held in the State of Texas during the year 1937.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 75) entitled "Joint resolution making funds available for the control of incipient or emergency outbreaks of insect pests or plant diseases, including grasshoppers, Mormon crickets, and chinch bugs."

The message also announced that the Senate had adopted the following resolution:

Senate Resolution 106

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. BENJAMIN K. FOCHT, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That a committee of two Senators be appointed by the Presiding Officer to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to attend the funeral of the deceased Representative.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Representative, the Senate do now take a recess until 12 o'clock meridian tomorrow.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein a radio address delivered by my colleague the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN] last evening.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, at the request of the Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing therein a speech broadcast by the Governor of the State of Alabama, Hon. Bibb Graves, on March 27 last.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary may have permission to sit this afternoon during the session of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Under the special order of the House heretofore made, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] is recognized for 30 minutes.

APPROPRIATIONS POLICY

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I should like to be permitted, if I may, to proceed for 15 or 20 minutes with what I hope shall be a chronological statement of my views, which I wish to present, and then I shall be very pleased to yield for any questions that my colleagues may care to submit.

When we entered this campaign 4 years ago against social and economic paralysis we were called upon as a Nation and as a Congress to engage the enemy in many battles and upon many fronts. Today I wish to speak to you about one of these objectives, and this relates to the credit and spending activities of the Government, and the objective so splendidly and worthily set out in our campaign promises of 1932 to try to reduce the cost of government.

The objective was all right, the intentions were good, but the gentlemen who drew that optimistic promise in the summer of 1932 made the human mistake of not being able to gage accurately and with precision the damage that had been done to our economic fabric, and how far it would be necessary for us to go before this damage might be repaired. When we set about this in the beginning we tried to do at least two things quickly; first, to reestablish confidence in our financial institutions, to liquefy their assets, and put them back as going concerns; and second, to reestablish the purchasing power of the American public in order that men and women might again have money in their pockets to go out and buy the goods, wares, and merchandise of our farmers and our tradesmen.

We had theretofore set up, through the medium of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, credit facilities which we extended to business and banks and industries and railroads and insurance companies, with the hope that by so doing they would be able to meet the financial needs of our people, but under this new order it was necessary for us to go further than business and industry and banks and railroads. We had to look beyond these institutions to the average, ordinary, everyday American citizen and be cognizant of his need of credit facilities.

And so we not only enlarged the scope of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, but we created other and newer agencies that would meet these special needs. We established help for agriculture through the Farm Credit Administration, the Federal land banks, help for the laborer through the Home Owners' Loan Corporation and the Federal Housing Administration, assisting these various groups of our citizens not covered by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. When we were making it possible for the average American citizen to use the credit of the United States Government, some thought it a shocking procedure. We had extended that privilege to banks and insurance companies and trust companies and railroads, and it did not occur to me to be so shocking to permit the ordinary taxpayer to use the credit of the Government. But while we extended this facility to him, by the same token at the same time we took out of the vaults of the banks and insurance companies and the trust companies hundreds of millions of dollars of their frozen assets and put in their place good solid, sound American dollars, to go back again into the channels of commerce and credit and industry, to meet the growing demand of business. In accomplishing this second objective, that is reestablishing the purchasing power of the American people, it was necessary, of course, to engage upon spending operations of large and staggering proportions. Many citizens were in pressing and immediate need of food and clothing. That problem was met immediately by the action of the Government, in some instances from appropriations for the purpose, and in others through cooperative efforts between the States, municipalities, and localities. Not only was that necessary, but in order to replace the obnoxious dole we had to establish a work-relief program with the opportunity to work and to acquire a living by honest employment. Not only did this spending program afford this relief, but today north, south, east, and west in this land, every county, every State, is dotted with splendid, fine, permanent, useful public improvements which attest the wisdom and integrity with which this work program was carried out. While this was going on every populous city, every municipality, aye, every country crossroads store, felt the impetus, the impulse, the rejuvenation, and new life of these American dollars that rolled through the pockets of our citizens and to the cash registers of our merchants, businessmen, and tradesmen, and made possible again a resumption of normal business activities.

All this has cost money. He was indeed an optimist who thought we could do this job without spending a little money. The emergency relief work, the relief program carried out by this Government, in its effectiveness, its speed, and its integrity is without a parallel in the history of our country. And that does not mean that it was free from defects or imperfections; but, considering the size of the job, the need for haste, its phenomenal achievements reflect credit upon those who had in charge its administration. In the building of this emergency organization, in inaugurating and in rendering these new services to our citizens, it was necessary to build up and create some large bureaus, new departments, and to employ a great many additional people for the Government. But we should not overlook the fact in counting this cost that while it is true that we have had to borrow some money and increase our national debt a few billion dollars, yet on the other hand the national wealth and the national income of this country have increased many times more than the national debt; and, so far as I am concerned, I am not particularly disturbed or uneasy about the economic situation in which we find ourselves, with a rejuvenated country; provided—and provided only, and, my colleagues, I measure and weigh my words—we recognize now, clearly and resolutely, our duty today and in the future with reference to appropriations.

We have come now to another cycle in this campaign of progress. If we would perpetuate these splendid victories, if we would preserve this equality that we have approximated for our agricultural population, if we would perpetuate this new opportunity that we have given to the laboring people of the country, if we would make steadfast the new security that we have brought to the aged and infirm, if we would try to carry on the opportunities for education and advancement that we have afforded to the youth of our country, then we must with steadfast determination, from now on, speed to the task of achieving another objective which has been delayed of necessity—and that the one which calls for a more even balance between our income and our public expenditures.

In sounding this note I would not wish to suggest for a moment that we retreat from these splendid undertakings or abandon this splendid new service which this Government, under its enlightened leadership, is bringing to our people. Many of these emergency functions properly belong to the States and municipalities; but the Federal Government, of sheer necessity, had to take them up.

With a return to approximately normal conditions, then unquestionably again States and municipalities should move prominently and aggressively into the center of this picture, and the Federal Government, in many instances, should move out.

But here again we could not stand on form and ceremony. The job had to be done, and it had to be done quickly. But we are a foolish people if we seek to blind our eyes to the fact that we cannot go on for an indefinite period without regard to the mounting cost of Government. We cannot continue to borrow and spend and spend and borrow unless we are reconciled to meet head-on some day the fiddler when he comes to collect his pay, and come he surely will. [Applause.]

I do not believe that we shall ever again approximate the cost of Government which we had a few years ago; so if any of us are so optimistic as to look forward to the day when we shall be back to a billion-dollar Budget again, forget it. That cannot come, nor should it come. We are a growing, expanding Nation. Almost with every day new demands come, many of them with great merit, and many of them that should be continued. There is hardly the most partisan critic that would wish to abandon some of these splendid enterprises.

I have already alluded to many of them—these new services: Rural electrification service, agricultural assistance, social security, railroad retirement, motor-vehicle regulation, regulation of securities by the Securities and Exchange Commission, protection of our natural resources by the Federal Power Commission and other agencies, assistance given to education and to youth, protection for labor, and many of these other splendid, fine enterprises which we do not wish to abandon.

But there is something we can do about it, and something we should do about it. In the first place, it is the duty of the House of Representatives to look after appropriations and to curtail public expenditures. It is the legislative function—not only the legislative function but peculiarly the function of the House of Representatives. I wish to say to you, my colleagues, with no intention to reflect upon the other body, that you may not look to the other end of the Capitol with any degree of hope that public expenditures will be curtailed there. I cannot seem to recall at the moment any instance when an appropriation bill ever traveled back this way from the other end of the Capitol less in amount than what it was when it went over there.

I do not mean that as any particular indictment of the other gentlemen, but it is the duty and function of this branch of the Congress. Not only is it the duty of the House of Representatives but there is an unusual duty upon the Committee on Appropriations, of which I have the honor to be a member. That brings me to say this, the members of the Appropriations Committee are your agents and your servants. We seek to bring you the best information and judgment we have upon matters submitted to us. We do not wish you to accept it without question, but we do ask, and we have a right to expect that you will give it that consideration which a long, painstaking effort on the part of that committee would justify you to give it. We ask you to cooperate with us in trying to hold down, as much as possible, the reasonable and necessary expenses of government. If expenditures are to be reduced, they will be reduced in the House of Representatives. This will be the place it will happen, if it happens at all.

In the second place, it is the duty of the House of Representatives to see that Government bureaus and departments are given no more funds than are necessary to carry out the functions for which they are created. In this connection it is my judgment that there should be the closest cooperation between the Bureau of the Budget and the House and the Comptroller General. Under the present set-up those agencies act more or less independently of each other. I have commented upon that at length on other occasions. I believe that the Comptroller General is an agent of the Congress. We should be able to rely upon him not only to police public expenditures and to prevent unlawful expenditures but to report to us and recommend to us from time to time duplicated efforts and points where savings could be made. Under no circumstances should this House ever consent to weaken or disarm the agency of the Comptroller General of the United States. [Applause.]

Wherever possible we should curtail governmental activities and, without hesitation, insist upon a liquidation of these emergency agencies when their usefulness has terminated. I am not one of those who believe that an appreciable savings will ever be made by the reorganization efforts. I think, undoubtedly, there are places where Government efficiency will be increased by some regrouping of activities. There are, undoubtedly, duplicated efforts that may be eliminated with a consequent small saving; but any savings which will make a dent in the ever-growing public expenditures will have to be made by holding down, eliminating, and curtailing expenditures in the House of Representatives.

Fourth, and most important of all, we should view with painstaking care and discriminating judgment and skepticism, if you please, all proposals which call for new undertakings and for new authorizations. That is where the real damage is done. I cannot too strongly urge this upon you, my friends, in the next few years when we are still being called upon to appropriate further for relief and for assistance. I believe we should abandon any idea of erecting monumental designs, memorials, and things of that sort that can be postponed and put off until we are upon a firmer economic basis.

There is no one thing that this Congress can do that will so promote our national security for the future, that will so strengthen the foundations of our Government against another such economic assault, if it should come, as to make a real serious effort to hold down and curtail the costs of government. By so doing not only shall we actually curtail expenditures, but what is of equal value, our countrymen will be heartened when they observe the legislative branch of our Government emerging out of the emotionalism and hysteria which of necessity must have characterized some of our earlier actions in those first hectic days. Their faith in us will be strengthened when they see us about our tasks again, serious-minded and frugal. If we can succeed in this effort to hold down public expenditures, then, in my judgment, in a reasonable time with the natural increase in revenues and tax collections which will come from a revival of business, our Budget will be reasonably in balance. If we do not succeed, if we shut our eyes and plunge forward blindly in the future, then we must become reconciled to one of two alternatives: Uncontrolled inflation or burdensome taxation, either of which will be detestable in the eyes of the people of America. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, we have progressed far on this highway of recovery; we move on, not yet to complete victory, if you please, but we have traveled a great distance. One can never realize how far one has gone up a gradual ascent until one stops and looks back, until one looks over one's shoulder toward whence one came. It is a far cry today to those dark, hectic, shadowy days of 4 years ago. There is yet high ground to be gained, but we move on; and we move on under the hand of a peerless and undaunted leader. [Applause.]

We move on under a leader who is undismayed and unafraid of criticism and denunciation, we move on under a leader who is "thrice-armed because he hath his quarrel just", we move on in this great cause.

I am amazed sometimes when I view the fury, the bitterness, the impatient intolerance which is heaped upon the head of this man. It is hard to understand. My mind goes back to a story told in the Book of Books: A great king sat upon his throne in judgment of a man who had been before him charged with heinous crimes and whose life was demanded as a forfeit. The king said to the people: "What has He done, what has He done that you are so furious, that you are demanding His life in payment?"

And they said: "Why, great king, this man is preaching strange doctrines that we never heard of before. He sets Himself up as a leader, a King of Kings. He speaks in a strange tongue. It shocks our orthodox ideas that have come rolling down to us through all these generations past. Why, He actually says the first shall be last and the last shall be first. Whoever heard of such blasphemy? Why, He actually harps about loving your neighbor as yourself and being kind and considerate; and He concerns Himself with feeding and clothing people; and what is most shocking of all, O king, He is upsetting our ancient institutions. Why, He actually went down to our great temple there and with His own hand laid the scourge upon the backs of the money-changers. And so we think it is about time to put an end to this man. We would like to have Him crucified."

Is it not strange?

What had Abraham Lincoln done to deserve the assassin's bullet? He tried to save a nation, he tried to preserve a union; and I, as a southern man steeped in all the blessed and glorious traditions of the land I love, do not hesitate to say that.

What had Woodrow Wilson done to call down upon his head the wrath and fury of the powers that be of that day until they almost literally and physically tore him limb from limb?

What has this man in the White House done? Name an act that he has done.

He has tried to save a great, stricken people. Aye! Not only tried but one needs only to be fair and honest, square and just; one needs only to be willing to give reasonable credit where credit is due to see that the phenomenal recovery we have made up to this good hour is due in the very largest measure to the dauntless courage, the humanitarian purpose, and the matchless leadership of Franklin D. Roosevelt. [Applause.]

No criticism or no aspersions today, no matter where they come from, can dim the luster of that service. The people of America trusted him in 1932 and, thank God, they did not trust him in vain. They continued to trust him in 1934 and again in 1936, and in 1937 the people of America look for continued leadership, not in Congress, not in any other branch of the Government, but in the White House of this Nation. Mr. Speaker, in these hectic days in which we live, when we act quickly and impulsively, I hope we will try to give credit where credit is due.

I hope this House in its wisdom and its judgment—and its ultimate judgment is usually good and sound—will take seriously, very seriously, if you please, this problem of governmental spending and governmental financing and see if we cannot from now on turn the tide back, go back to a more even balance between our expenditures and our receipts.

Mr. Speaker, if I have any time remaining I shall be glad to yield. [Applause.]

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. What recommendations has the gentleman and spokesman for the administration with reference to the enormous expenditures of government in trying to bring those expenditures back to where they were in peacetimes and formerly in order that we might eventually be able to get a balanced Budget so far as the Government is concerned?

Mr. WOODRUM. I may say to the gentleman, in the first place, I do not think we can ever hope to get back to the billion-dollar Budget or the two or three billion dollar Budget. We have set our hands to tasks from which we do not wish to retreat. If we can hold down the public expenditures so that they will not increase on us, if we can liquidate these emergency organizations that should be liquidated, now that the emergency has passed, cut down the employed personnel of the Government and let them be absorbed by industry, hold down our expenditures and watch the constant effort to embark the Government on new undertakings, then with the natural increases that will come to us in the way of revenue from tax measures already upon the books I believe our Budget will come reasonably into balance. It may be necessary for some restatement of tax policy, but certainly it will not be necessary to embark upon any burdensome tax program, if we can prevent further increases in appropriations.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, I have enjoyed immensely this remarkably interesting address, and I agree with it practically in its entirety. But I am a little disappointed in one statement by my distinguished friend from Virginia, and I am sure he did not mean it exactly as stated.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] may proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, I refer to the gentleman's statement with respect to the marvelous leadership of the President of the United States, with all of which I heartily agree, but I am afraid he has inadvertently failed to give proper credit to the House of Representatives unless there is correction made in one statement when he said that the people of this country are not looking to the Congress of the United States for leadership but to the President. I know the gentleman, as an able member of the Appropriations Committee, knows that the President of the United States, as the head of the executive department, would be wholly impotent and helpless if it were not for the Congress of the United States, and particularly the appropriating branch of the Congress; that no function of government can carry on without the cooperation of this House. I feel that the gentleman should extend his statement in regard to the Congress. I feel that the people of America are looking to the House of Representatives today for continued leadership. I think that leadership has been glorious, along with the leadership of the President of the United States, during the past 4 years.

Mr. WOODRUM. I can subscribe to what the gentleman says. Unquestionably the legislative branch of the Government has its functions to perform. In these hectic days often we had to yield judgment to leadership on account of the need for speed in action. Now we should get back to a resumption of our legislative functions.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to no man in this body for a genuine appreciation of this great body which comprises, as it does, a cross section of all the American people; but after all, the people of America look to Franklin D. Roosevelt and his leadership. [Applause.] I do not retreat from that position that they look to the President for leadership for formulation of policies and for guidance—not meaning to underestimate for one instant the part that the Members of the House of Representatives play.

Mr. COCHRAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COCHRAN. I think the gentleman's statement comes at an opportune time and I hope the legislative committees of the House will take notice, especially in view of the fact that only this morning, according to the RECORD, one of our committees is meeting to consider a new Federal-aid project which means at the outset an annual Federal-aid appropriation of $200,000,000.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, I want my distinguished friend from Virginia to understand I do not detract in the slightest from the leadership of the President. What I am trying to emphasize is the statement that the President of the United States could not operate the White House if it were not for the appropriating authorities of the House of Representatives.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. What effort can be made with the various departments of Government, as they now exist, to get them to hold down on the requests for appropriations which they are asking, which might seem trivial at first, but which are going to amount to more than $200,000,000 in the case of many projects, including the one that the gentleman from Missouri talked about? We are going to have lots of those projects come before the House before the present Congress adjourns. I can see them coming.

Mr. WOODRUM. I may say to the gentleman you do not have to make any effort so far as the departments are concerned. It is all up to the Appropriations Committee and the House of Representatives. We hold the key and we can do the job. [Applause.]

Mr. RICH. Yes, but the Appropriations Committee will not do it.

CONTESTED ELECTION—WILLIAMS v. MAAS

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the Clerk of the House, which was read, referred to the Committee on Elections No. 1, and ordered printed.

The Clerk read as follows:

MARCH 30, 1937.

Hon. WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD,
Speaker of the House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: I have the honor to inform the House that in the Fourth Congressional District of the State of Minnesota at the election held November 3, 1936, Melvin J. Maas was certified as having been duly elected as a Representative in the Seventy-fifth Congress, and his certificate of election in due form of law was filed in this office. His right to the seat was questioned by another candidate, Howard Y. Williams, who served notice upon the returned Member of his purpose to contest the election. During the time allowed by law for the taking of testimony the Clerk of the House received a statement dated February 27, 1937, by the contestant Howard Y. Williams and by his attorneys, withdrawing the contest and asking that it be dismissed. This notice of withdrawal will be transmitted to the Committee on Elections, to which this case shall be referred.

Yours respectfully,

SOUTH TRIMBLE,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL, 1938

Mr. COLLINS, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H. R. 5996) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 483), which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

Mr. TABER reserved all points of order on the bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. HOUSTON and Mr. ALLEN of Delaware asked and were given permission to extend their own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FULLER] is recognized for 10 minutes.

INVESTIGATION OF LIQUOR INDUSTRY

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced a resolution authorizing a committee of five to be appointed with authority to determine as to whether or not the distillers and their associates have a monopoly upon the liquor business and are violating the antitrust laws and as to whether or not they are receiving special favors and are being aided and the law evaded by Government officials under their control and domination.

There is no doubt of the existence of a Whisky Trust and a Bottle Trust. These powerful monopolies are not only violating the Sherman antitrust law but are dictating to the Treasury Department all rules and regulations governing the manufacture, sale, and distribution of liquors. The Whisky Trust is one of the biggest monopolies ever known in this country and is rapidly becoming a national scandal. It maintains a powerful lobby with millions for expenses and employs at unreasonable and shocking salaries influential executives with strong political connections.

The Owens Illinois Glass Co. produces 85 percent of whisky bottles and its president and vice president are directors of the National Distillers.

Eighty percent of the liquor in the United States is produced by nine distillers. The National Distillers produces 22 percent; Schenley, 16 percent; and Seagrams, 9 percent. These same distillers were favored by Dr. Doran and permitted to manufacture during the prohibition period, thereby making millions and accumulating a big surplus, which is now being sold at outrageous prices. They have purchased practically all of the famous distillers and brands in the United States and dominate and regulate the price of all liquor.

For 30 years Dr. James M. Doran was in the Treasury Department, administered the law during prohibition, and built up the personnel of the Alcohol Unit in the Treasury Department, in which there is practically no Democrat holding a key position. He was appointed on the interdepartmental board and drew the rules and regulations for the N. R. A. alcohol control, as well as the orders of the Treasury Department, and now appears at all hearings, and as a result of his influence no ruling has been made except with his approval. When he had well performed his task to the great satisfaction of the Liquor and Bottle Trust he was hired by the Distiller Spirits Institute at a salary of $30,000 per year and has since been raised to $50,000 annually.

R. E. Joyce, one of his subordinates and who issued permits under the Federal Alcohol Control Administration to the favored few, is now the manager for National Distillers in Washington.

These distillers, who constitute the Whisky Trust, own and dominate an institution known as the Distilled Spirits Institute. Recently W. Forbes Morgan resigned as treasurer of the Democratic National Committee and accepted a position as president of the Distilled Spirits Institute at a guaranteed salary of $500,000 for the next 5 years. Under his leadership, the distillers will influence public opinion by educational methods on legislation affecting the industry and problems of liquor control, according to Mr. Morgan's recent statement. Mr. Morgan is not experienced in the liquor business and everyone knows that he was guaranteed this unreasonable and outrageous salary, which is much more than that paid the President, in order to obtain his influence with the Democratic administration and, if possible, the President. The American people will now be educated by the Whisky Trust.

Schenley Products Co. announces the appointment of Mr. Leo R. Sack, retiring United States envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Costa Rica, as vice president. Mr. Sack will be in charge of public relations for all Schenley affiliated companies.

Grover Whalen, influential New York Democratic politician, close to Democratic chieftains and prominently mentioned as the next mayor of New York City, draws $75,000 a year as chairman of the board of Schenley, for which salary he is probably only used for window dressing and for political influence in obtaining special favors.

Harry L. Lourie, formerly in the Treasury Department, and who helped to draw the liquor codes, has resigned and been awarded a handsome position with The Importers.

Small distillers, anxious to make a good grade of liquor and sell cheaper, are barred from a permit to operate. This whisky monopoly is selling 4-year-old whisky for $24 per gallon which costs only $1 to make and carry for 4 years—shrinkage, evaporation, and interest included. Add to this $2 for Federal tax and $1 for bottling and labels and observe the enormous $20 per gallon profit. No wonder the Distilled Spirits Institute now has over $400,000 in its treasury and pays such enormous salaries to those capable of administering political pressure. I sometimes wonder as to whether or not this money will be used to kill my resolution which they have been anticipating. From now on they will flock to Washington like the Egyptian locusts.

There is not a person in the liquor business in the United States that does not know that it is controlled by a trust. Only the chosen few were granted permits as distillers. Small distillers are not able to qualify due to the fact that the Treasury Department, under its assumed authority to enact laws, known as rules and regulations, requires a bond of at least $60,000 from the distiller and a $100,000 bond for his warehouse. The bond must be furnished by a surety company which exacts the deposits of Federal bonds for protection; thus the distiller is required to furnish $160,000 in Federal bonds, deposit them with the surety company, and pay a premium for his bond.

It is clearly the object of the liquor interests to ruthlessly eliminate all distillers and all brands except a few, which they own, comparable to the number of cigarette brands on the market.

The Federal Alcohol Administration, which it was thought would be independent and able to make its own rules and regulations, is still under the Treasury Department, due to the fact that the members of the Board have not been appointed. This Administration had two Republican chairmen, both of whom resigned, as it is understood, because of the Whisky Trust and interference by the Alcohol Tax Unit of the Treasury Department.

My resolution has been referred to the Committee on Rules. I will insist upon an early hearing. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD regarding the Honorable Benjamin Kurtz Focht, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. O'MALLEY] is recognized for 30 minutes.

SELECT COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE REAL ESTATE BONDHOLDERS' REORGANIZATIONS

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, I want it distinctly understood today that the remarks I am about to make are not made in any partisan sense whatsoever. I am a member of the Select Committee to Investigate Real Estate Bondholders' Reorganizations and upon that committee serve two Republican Members of the House These Members served both the committee and the interests of the bondholders as efficiently and diligently as any of the Democrats. I say this in deserving compliment to my two Republican colleagues who have worked with us without stint of time or effort in the arduous duties imposed by the committee's responsibilities.

On Thursday last the committee of which I am a member, and in particular the chairman of that committee, was subjected to an attack upon the floor of this House the like of which I have not known in the three terms in which I have been a Member of this body. The chairman of our committee directly and by innuendo was charged by the gentleman from Evanston, Ill., with neglect of duty, dilatory tactics, harming the interests of the bondholders, and his motives and honesty were impugned in the most direct terms. Unfortunately, because of urgent official business with a governmental department, I was not present at the time of the remarks of the gentleman from Evanston, but I was able to read them in the RECORD the following morning.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as long as I have been a Member of this body I have endeavored to conduct myself in accordance with what I considered the ordinary decencies of legislative courtesy. Whenever I have felt called upon to criticize a Member or a committee I have first brought my criticisms to the committee itself, submitted my charges, and requested an explanation. In addition, I have diligently endeavored to inform the Member or committee I proposed to criticize of the fact that I should talk about them so they might be present and make reply if I were incorrect in any statement. This procedure I have felt to be the conduct of gentlemen serving together in a parliamentary body.

I realize now that the gentleman from Evanston does not share this opinion of mine as to legislative conduct, because neither I nor any other member of the committee was informed in advance that he intended to take the floor to make his vitriolic attack upon our chairman or our committee. The fantastic charges and studied innuendo of the gentleman from Evanston deserve careful examination before discussion, but the first consideration that I shall give is to wonder at his purpose in making his sudden attack upon both the integrity of the chairman of our committee and the good faith and activity of the committee itself.

More than a week ago, March 22 to be exact, the House Judiciary Committee gave notice that they would hold a hearing this week upon our proposed bill to amend section 77B in the interest of the millions of defaulted bondholders of the Nation. This bill of ours proposes to take out of the custody of the racketeers now operating these defaulted properties the control of the bonds and create conservators to administer the properties until the bondholders shall have been paid. I hope it was not the purpose of the gentleman from Evanston to withhold his attack upon our committee until such time as the proposed legislation was ready for hearing, so that our committee's recommendations might be adversely affected by the stigma he has attempted to attach to our work, our suggestions, and our recommendations.

The attack of the gentleman from Evanston was without warning. It was made from the ambush of a unanimous-consent request which gave no indication of his purpose. His ammunition was hoary with age, consisting of editorials from special privilege newspapers whose own attorneys have been subpenaed, investigated, and subjected to examination by us because of their operations in the field of defaulted bonds. The law cases he cited as the basis for criticisms of our chairman were, as shown yesterday, started long before the committee was in existence. What has impelled the courageous gentleman from Evanston to hold himself back so long from launching his attack until the very eve of the hearings upon our proposed bill? What has enabled him to carry the great weight of his implied tremendous revelations for so long a time without bringing his charges to the attention of the House or our committee long before this? Surely the gentleman reads the newspapers regularly and must have noted these editorials when they first appeared more than 2 years ago. Or is he a master strategist holding his fire until the crucial moment in the committee's work on behalf of the bondholders when corrective legislation is pending?

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am the only member of the investigating committee who is not a lawyer. The gentleman from Evanston is a lawyer. I have become wise enough in the past 2 years of service with the investigating committee to take much to heart the revised adage "that when lawyers fall out, common men like myself must beware", but when the gentleman from Evanston attacks the good faith and the efforts of the committee of which I am a member, in the very hour when the committee's work is about to bear fruition, I have a right to wonder at the sudden zeal which impelled his attack and inspired his charges.

Our investigation, if Members will take the time to study the record of our hearings, shows that a majority of the bondholder and foreclosure cases in Cook County emanate from one principal firm, the Chicago Title & Trust Co. Our investigation likewise discloses that a majority of cases affecting this company have with surprising regularity seemed to find their way before certain State and Federal judges in Chicago. The accusations, entirely unsubstantiated, that the chairman of our committee has used his office to influence law cases toward the firm of which he is a member quite properly give me the right to wonder as to whether or not a display of friendliness toward these firms and judges might not also have its effect. I would not want to paraphrase the old prayer, "Praise firms and judges from whom all lucrative law cases seem to flow in Cook County", but the work of our committee in exposing these bond racketeers certainly would wipe out any hope of any member of our committee getting any legal business from these monopolists of the foreclosure law business in Chicago.

I would like to believe the attack of the gentleman from Evanston upon our committee and its members was entirely unpremeditated, and prompted only by his zeal for the welfare of the millions of bondholders, holding as the only evidence of their lifetime savings almost worthless certificates of deposit issued by these racketeering committees which our committee has not only investigated but in many instances put out of business in the last few years. I would like to believe that his zeal for the poor and downtrodden, the defrauded, and misled bondholder had caused him to diligently study all the hearings and records of our committee only to dig up the insinuating and questionable material which he inserted in the RECORD last Thursday. I would like to believe that the gentleman from Evanston rose in his place to challenge our integrity and our service on this committee, to assail and impugn an elderly and sick man, unequipped physically to answer him, after having first brought these matters to the attention of those most concerned in his implications. I would like to believe all these things because I know the caliber and intelligence of the constituency of the gentleman from Evanston. I wanted to believe in his protestations in the interest of the bondholders so sincerely that I took the trouble not only to examine his charges word for word but to look up his legislative record in connection with bondholders' legislation.

All of us were in favor of this investigation.

Now I am sure he did not intend to give the impression that he helped bring about the investigation. If he did I must correct such impression. The gentleman from Evanston was neither a Member of Congress nor had he anything to do with the passage of the bill calling for the investigation and creation of the committee by the Seventy-third Congress. The original bill to create such a committee was introduced by myself and with the aid and assistance of the dean of the House, the gentleman from Illinois. The Rules Committee was finally prevailed upon to report a resolution to the House and our committee was created. Since the creation of that committee, more than 20 public hearings have been held extending over 56 full days. I was present at approximately 15 of these hearings or more than half for a total of more than 42 days. Many of these hearings were held within a few miles of the "silk stocking" district represented by the gentleman from Evanston, and never once did I note his appearance at any of these meetings. I shall refer to this striking contrast with his protested interest in the bondholders a little later in my remarks.

Let me quote the gentleman from Evanston again. He says in his remarks concerning the committee—

> That was in 1934. Since then those reorganizations have either been completed or soon will be completed.

Apparently the gentleman is as backward in his reading of our committee's report as he has been in catching up on the newspaper editorials that he uses in assailing our committee's work. The report of our committee to the House last year shows that more than 75 percent of the defaulted properties have never gone into court to petition for a reorganization under 77B. Instead these so-called protective committees have continued to operate these properties to the detriment of the bondholders, perhaps in the hope that our investigation would cease and there would be no watch or check on their fairness to the bondholders and the size of their fees when they finally went into court to reorganize these properties.

The gentleman makes another statement, unsubstantiated by any evidence, and I quote him:

> The only thing we have done is to delay and retard legislation for the bondholders by the activities of our committee.

In this statement the gentleman charges not only myself, but the other members of the committee, including the Republican members, with retarding and delaying legislation.

His information on legislation concerning the bondholders is as faulty as this assumption of his. Early last year our committee prepared and had referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, a bill proposing to correct the evils we had uncovered. We were unsuccessful in getting that committee to act upon our bill. A little later a bill was presented and referred to the Judiciary Committee. Many hearings on this bill were held by the Judiciary Committee, but the gentleman from Evanston, even though his heart overflowed with pity for the poor bondholder—thousands of them in his own district, as he says—was present at none of these hearings, although the press which he reads and from which he clips aged and bewhiskered editorials, gave full notice of these hearings, even reporting extracts from them day to day. Where was the gentleman from Evanston when this proposed legislation was before the Judiciary Committee?

Why had he no amendments or improvements to suggest that might help the bill? He charges that legislation was retarded. No member of the Judiciary Committee with whom I have discussed this question recalls even a letter from the gentleman urging the favorable report of our bill, and although the bill lay in committee for months the gentleman, who knows the rules of this House as well as I, did not take advantage of the discharge rule to file a petition with the Clerk to bring the bill to a vote even though, as he says, "I have carefully gone through the hearings held before the Judiciary Committee because also of my desire to see corrective legislation enacted."

No one will deny that he must have studied the hearings most assidiously, because throughout the many pages of the hearings he was able to dig up a few sections and use them to reflect upon the chairman, our dean of the House. But nowhere in his remarks does his study of the hearings indicate that he analyzed the bill or found some ways by which the bondholders, whom he professes so much interest in, might be more efficiently aided by our proposed legislation. He is a lawyer and he says in his own remarks:

> All of us who are to the slightest extent acquainted with reorganization procedure * * * know that the greatest curse to the completion of a plan * * * is the so-called shyster lawyer.

Surely he, of all Members of the House, in this one instance alone, would have been able to make valuable suggestions to our committee as to how our proposed bill should deal with the shyster lawyer and curb the activities of such ugly ornaments of the bar. But never a word, never a suggestion, never a proffer of help to us in our difficult responsibility. Until Thursday all the gentleman's knowledge of the real-estate bondholder racket was hidden, not only from we humble members of your select committee but from the House. I would be a most unpleasant person if I were to think of this again in contrast to the gentleman's statement of Thursday:

> I asked that question because of my interest in securing such legislation as may be necessary to help the bondholders.

But in spite of our loss in not having the courageous and energetic help of the gentleman from Evanston, nevertheless, after protracted hearings, the Judiciary Committee reported our bill to the floor in the last session. In the haste of adjournment and despite the efforts of every member of the committee with the leadership of the House, we were unable to secure passage of our bill. No fault attaches to anyone, because every Member knows the difficulties of controversial legislative consideration in the closing days of a session. Yet the gentleman from Evanston, who should be familiar with all these things, has charged our committee with retarding legislation. Well, the duty that the gentleman claims he owes his constituents who are bondholders, and which he claims as the justification for his attack Thursday, still rests upon his shoulders. His performance of that duty in connection with our proposed legislation, not only last year but this year, I leave to the judgment of his constituents and the Members of this House.

The gentleman from Evanston was not, so far as I can learn, present at a single one of the committee hearings to urge a favorable report on our bill. Yet he protests much his feeling for the bondholders. Only a native sense of humor restrains me from further comment on his "great love."

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'MALLEY. I yield.

Mr. FULLER. Is it not a fact that every other Member of the House from Chicago came to our committee meetings and gave us the benefit of their assistance?

Mr. O'MALLEY. I will say to the gentleman from Arkansas that that is the fact, so far as I can recall. The only unrepresented Member from Chicago was the gentleman from Evanston.

Now let me turn to another portion of the gentlemen's remarks of Thursday. He gets much excited about the fact that our committee availed itself of the services of a number of lawyers in Chicago who offered to serve the committee without pay in helping it do its work. Our appropriation was limited. More than 10,000 separate protective committees needed our attention and more than a million bondholders clamored for our investigation into the committees handling their property.

The gentleman's remarks, and I hope I have interpreted them correctly, would indicate that he believes no lawyer would serve his country, the public welfare, or a committee of Congress without expecting in some way to profit either in the present or in the future. Not being a lawyer myself, as the gentleman from Evanston is, I leave it up to him to attack the motives and ethics of members of his own profession. The fact remains, however, that although the law offices of the gentleman from Evanston are in the same building with those of the chairman of our committee, there is no record to show that he ever volunteered his services to the committee to help expose and correct the evils that the bondholders suffer from, nor that he gave one single day of his time as a capable and, I am sure, skilled lawyer to the work of the committee in Chicago. I regret, as I am sure that the other members of the committee do, that never once did he have a day to spare from his arduous personal duties to help us salvage from the bond racketeers some of the savings of his own constituents whom he protests to love so much. I might add to this that since 1934 there has been a vacancy on our committee from the Republican side, caused by the defeat of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Our committee membership when the gentleman from Evanston became a Member of the House has comprised four Democrats and two Republicans, although the original committee was set up with a membership of seven. I can find no record that the gentleman from Evanston ever sought to be appointed to this vacancy on the Republican side of the committee, and this raises another regret in my mind. Had he been a member of our committee, or had he sought the vacancy to which the Republican side was entitled, and become a member of our committee, I am sure that he might have saved us from the mistakes he claims were made. He might have guided us to more effectively serve the bondholders, and all our efforts might have been more successful through his membership upon the committee. Of course, I do not need to make any comment, because I do not know why the gentleman failed to seek appointment upon our committee when a vacancy was in existence, but I think in view of his remarks of Thursday that I am entitled to wonder why his burning ambition to help the bondholders was not evidenced by a similar ambition to get on the committee, where his efforts could be more effective.

Our service on this committee has not been one calculated to make any member popular with the special-privilege press or with the "sacred cows" of business that we have been forced to investigate and question. You know, I have had some experience in newspaper work, and in every town and with every newspaper there are sacred cows that must not be criticized or attacked by anyone, no matter what they do or whom they rob. In Detroit we prodded some of these sacrosanct cattle, and the Detroit News, from which the gentleman from Evanston quotes, rose in indignation to condemn our committee; but later, when we proved out of their own mouths that some of these whited sepulchers were looting the properties they were entrusted with, there were no editorials. That is not surprising, considering who controls most modern newspapers. I have even had a newspaper print the speech of another Member of the House in its columns and charge me with having made it and attack me in an editorial for something I had not said. I have a thick skin, however, grown thicker as a result of 3 years' training upon a most unpopular investigating committee, so the press or its opinions of my legislative service never causes me a moment's loss of sleep.

The gentleman from Evanston, in quoting the editorial attacking our chairman, says:

> I am advised that that is a typical description of the hearings in Chicago.

He admits by this statement that although the Chicago hearings were held but three blocks away from his law office, he got all his information for his tirade against our committee second-hand from the newspapers, and never troubled himself to attend any of the hearings to find out whether the newspaper reports were correct. I wonder how much of the rest of his attack of Thursday is based upon "advices" from outside sources rather than personal knowledge or experience of his own.

Our committee has unquestionably annoyed people in the silk-stocking and gold-coast district that the gentleman represents and in other high places. Now these people want to retaliate and assail our chairman. I do not have to stand here and defend the chairman of our committee from any of the charges of the gentleman from Evanston. He himself has answered them much better than I could in his remarks of yesterday, but the charge that the people are sick of the investigation and want no more of it ought to be supported by evidence from the bondholders themselves rather than from newspaper editorials that were probably written in law offices right after we had released some of these "gold coast" corporation lawyers from committee custody and uncomfortable questioning.

I repeat that the gentleman from Evanston says the people are sick of this investigation. It may surprise him, but in the last few months since our committee's functioning was curtailed by lack of funds I have received many letters from bondholders beseeching the committee to continue, but I have not yet received a single letter from anybody who was subpenaed and examined asking us to continue the committee and keep investigating their corporations. I know one gentleman, an officer of the Chicago Title & Trust Co., who for more than a year, in spite of his agreement with the committee that he would produce papers on trust 17400, kept his special police turning our process servers out of the sumptuous offices of his company. Finally, my native disposition getting the best of me, I took the subpena myself and served it personally, and he had me forcibly ejected from his office. But I forgive him, reminding him only that I regret I had the dignity of the House to preserve, and could not show him who was the better man at this throwing-out business.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'MALLEY. Yes.

Mr. LUCAS. Does the gentleman care to speculate as to whom he thinks is sick of this investigation?

Mr. O'MALLEY. I would hazard the guess that some lawyers are sick of it, that the Chicago Title & Trust Co. is sick of it, that some of the banks in Chicago are sick of it, and, mind, you, the gentleman from Evanston, who is most concerned about Chicago, seems to imply that he is sick of it, too. He did not have any criticism of us while we were in Philadelphia, where the committee got 19 indictments, or in New York, or in any other place. The sickness, the upset of the stomach, the nausea that seems to be afflicting those who attack the committee, comes from Chicago.

It may be only a coincidence that the chairman of the committee has his home there, but it is also a coincidence that most of our witnesses live in the Evanston gentleman's "silk stocking" district. Perhaps that is why they are feeling so ill in dear old Evanston, Glencoe, and points north. I know this gentleman who had me thrown out of his office by his special police is probably sick of our committee. I sent a truck and had the papers removed from his office when he failed to keep his promise for a year. I know that he would not like to have this investigation continue. And I know a member of a Chicago law firm who wrote to Milwaukee just before the 1934 election and said, "What can you get on that fellow O'MALLEY that we can use." He's another fellow who probably has cramps when our committee is mentioned. I know these fellows would not like to see the investigation continue, because they figure I might get mad at them and annoy them some more with unpleasant questions. I do not care what they think of me, because the special-privilege gang and the prostituted press has screamed invective at me for years in my district, but so far have not been able to fool our people into believing their lies, gossip, and dirty innuendo. I know there are a lot of people who would like this investigation discontinued. Now, my friends, I have served on the committee for about 2½ years. I have attended three-quarters of their hearings. When the gentleman from Evanston uses a newspaper editorial to insinuate that our chairman "is found at the receiving end of a substantial fee for legal services of questioned value" he makes a statement that he ought to be able to support.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'MALLEY. When the gentleman from Evanston says, "I demand full disclosure of the facts because certain factional information which I have in my possession does not square with statements made on the floor of this body by the chairman of the committee", he ought to produce those facts. I heard rumors about our committee from the first day it was created. That is the old game of crooks to spread rumors to save themselves. I took the trouble to personally make a thorough investigation of these old rumors that the gentleman from Evanston has put in the RECORD, and I say in this particular case in which $6,400 was supposed to be the fee, that I personally saw the papers, and that that case was filed in court 2 years before our committee was created. I made that investigation at the request of a Member of the House who is no longer here, but who trusted me enough to ask me to check into these scurrilous charges. I heard those rumors, and I also noted that shortly after our committee criticized Judge Barnes about the handling of certain cases in his court and took him to task for the way he passed on the fate of millions of poor people who had their life savings invested in these bonds, that this judge saw fit to vacate a fee that had been allowed a long time ago. Whether or not the judge was venting his spleen upon the chairman of our committee, or whether he thought the court had made a mistake when it first granted the fee, is for the judge to answer, not me. He is a Chicago judge, and my opinion of Chicago justice were better unsaid.

Mr. KELLY of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'MALLEY. Yes.

Mr. KELLY of Illinois. I remind the gentleman from Wisconsin that Judge Barnes, since his name has been brought into this discussion, was sitting as a Federal judge, and did receive a fee of $35,000 from the Chicago Title & Trust Co.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Our committee was informed of that, and an attorney of our committee, using that as a basis, asked for a change of venue in a bondholders case and the judge refused to grant the change of venue.

Of course, I have no purpose here to air the soiled linen of any other State. The conduct of Federal judges in Chicago is the business of the Members from Illinois, just as the conduct of any Federal judges in my State would be the business of the Members from Wisconsin.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'MALLEY. I yield.

Mr. CULKIN. It was suggested that Judge Barnes received a fee of $35,000 after he was on the bench. Was that matter ever submitted to the proper committee of Congress?

Mr. O'MALLEY. All I know is that when that was brought to our attention our record indicated that the Members who were sitting at that time in Chicago suggested that our chief investigator submit that to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. CULKIN. Might I suggest to the gentleman that that act of receiving that fee while he was on the bench exactly parallels the charges upon which Judge Ritter, of Florida, was removed from the Federal bench.

Mr. O'MALLEY. I do not know the details of Judge Barnes being on the receiving end of the fee. I did not investigate it myself. I figured that he was a Chicago judge and that the Chicago and Illinois Members ought to be able to take care of their own judges, and if they are guilty of wrongdoing, take the floor here and impeach them.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'MALLEY. Just as soon as I have finished my statement.

Mr. CHURCH. Will the gentleman clarify the statement he just made?

Mr. O'MALLEY. I presume to conduct myself in the same manner as the gentleman from Evanston conducted himself when he made his remarks on Thursday, so I cannot yield to him.

Mr. Speaker, innuendo is a weapon of stealth. It destroys men's reputations. By imputation and without production of a single fact, the gentleman from Evanston made a long statement in the RECORD which could be taken to affect the integrity of our chairman. He attacks an investigator of the committee whom I had nothing to do with hiring and whom I never met until after he served us faithfully for months. He gives the impression that this Mr. Tupy got $45,000 as his fee, but nowhere does he show any factual evidence of these charges. The impression he leaves was that here was an investigator of the committee, working on the committee, getting $45,000 for his share of the bondholders' fee, and yet yesterday the chairman of our committee proved by letters from the very members of that protective committee that no such fee was ever asked nor had a penny ever been paid to anyone. But still that unfair implication rests in the RECORD. It is part of the records of the United States and will never be destroyed. That is the thing I object to; I object to such vicious innuendoes, to putting in half facts and saying half truths about people that in the future may be further distorted to injure their reputation.

On page 2791 the gentleman from Evanston says:

A great deal was heard about the Chicago Title & Trust Co.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield on the Tupy matter?

Mr. O'MALLEY. I cannot yield. I said a good many things about the Chicago Title & Trust Co., and everything I said is in the record, as well as the statements of the other members of the committee, and yet nowhere in the remarks of the gentleman from Evanston does he take a single line or a single question from the printed record of the committee as a basis for his criticism of our actions. What has happened to his trained legal mind that he could not quote our hearings to harm us? Or were our hearings too good to substantiate his attack?

When he says no indictments were made in Chicago, I want to inform him that at most of our hearings, at the request of the committee, was a representative not only of the United States district attorney's office but of the State attorney's office. I want to say to him, of course, if no indictments or prosecutions were made, I, as one member of the committee, am not responsible for the method by which they dispense justice in Illinois. There were indictments in Pennsylvania. There were indictments in New York. Because the statute of limitations had run on most of these gentlemen when we had a hearing is not the responsibility of our committee. It is impossible to prosecute gentlemen who have been clever enough, some of them through their friends in the State legislature and in other important places, to keep out of the clutches of the prosecuting authorities until the statute had run. It is not up to me to comment upon the processes of justice in Chicago, but I do know that we have time after time submitted to the proper prosecuting authorities facts that we had produced and requested that they make investigation and bring about prosecutions.

Our committee never had any punitive power. I submit that it is unfair to charge our committee with neglect of duty simply because we are not able to go into court and prosecute some of these fellows. We produced the facts; the duty to punish rested upon another branch of the Government.

The last report of our committee, which I have before me, shows that we have forced reduction of fees in over 600 cases, and in the Paramount-Publix case alone we forced a reduction of a fee, when the judge was ready to grant it, of $3,000,000, and that money went back into the assets of the bondholders, and the bondholders will eventually receive it in interest and dividends.

The last report of our committee which I hold in my hand gives a comprehensive summary of the work we have performed. We have investigated thousands of reorganizations. We have forced reduction of fees in scores of cases by submitting to the judges sitting on these cases facts which our investigators produced in the course of the hearings. Many of the judges—not in Chicago, of course—have written our committee praising us for the aid we have been to their courts in seeing that justice was done the bondholders.

I am going to conclude by saying this about the chairman of the committee, under whom I have been proud to serve: He has conducted this committee without fear or favor to anybody. Never once, when I have asked for a subpena or the production of a witness or a paper, has he ever so much as suggested that I forego that request and that that person should not be brought before the committee. I want to say more about the chairman in that he has been in a most difficult position. He has leaned backward in every incident to be fair and courteous and he has treated racketeers who have openly said to our committee that, "Yes; they have done things prejudicial to the interest of the bondholders; but what could we do about it?" He has treated some of these clever and greedy gentlemen with a great deal more courtesy than they would have received from me were I chairman of the committee.

He has sat upon the committee and seen men whom he has known all his life subpenaed before the committee and subjected to the most arduous cross-examination upon some of their operations, but he has never attempted in any way to interfere with any member of the committee, he has never attempted in any way to stop the committee from going into any subject, and I submit to you today that if it becomes a question between the gentleman from Evanston and the gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of this committee, as to which has served the people of the country the better, I am proud to stand on the side of our dean as I think most other Members of this House will agree.

He needs no defense from the remarks or the innuendo of the gentleman from Evanston. I do not think any other member of the committee needs any defense. We have been entitled, however, to full and fair notice of this attack upon us and our service to the people in our capacity as Representatives, and when the gentleman from Evanston says in his remarks, "These are things that should be investigated by our Rules Committee", he ought by this time to have the resolution for such investigation introduced in the House and before the Rules Committee. When after the long tirade he says, "If they are true we ought to know about them", and by that statement alone convicts himself of making charges that he himself hesitates to stand squarely behind, but seeks the aid of another committee of the House to help him prove his contentions. I have regretted a great deal that I have felt impelled to take this time to analyze the attack of the gentleman from Evanston upon our chairman and our committee. I refer you to the RECORD of yesterday wherein the remarks of the chairman of our committee, together with the letter he introduced, completely refutes the material introduced in the RECORD by the gentleman from Evanston. I want to say for myself that the allegations and insinuations of the gentleman from Evanston against our chairman carry no weight with me in view of his own legislative record in connection with all our long efforts to pass legislation in behalf of the bondholder. I want to reiterate my own confidence not only in the integrity of our dean of the House but say that I have never served under a chairman of a committee during my service who has more faithfully, energetically, and skillfully carried out the responsibility placed upon his shoulders when he was given the chairmanship of this committee and designated by the House to perform a most difficult and arduous duty.

I hope that never again will any Member of the House be subjected to the statements, the innuendoes, and the implications that appeared in last Thursday's RECORD under the remarks of the gentleman from Evanston. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Under the previous order of the House the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] is recognized for 5 minutes.

WHO IS THIS MAN?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, surely you know him, this man who found a nation ridden with fear and brought it through to new confidence;

Who summons courage equal to the hour, either to close the banks or to cross good souls by offering beer to thirsty White House guests; who lashes out at his enemies with hard scorn, yet whose heart melts when he sees a lonely young girl at her first East Room party and tells her, by his order, to command the most handsome young man on the adjoining terrace to waltz with her;

Who speaks before throngs with such seeming assurance, yet whose hand, we see, trembles while he waits out the long applause; who stands with dignity before the world, yet who, as a kindly host, draws a familiar crumpled pack of cigarettes from his pocket and, with apologies, offers them to the lady on his left, even as you and I;

Who lives with human warmth in a thousand flashing moments on and off the national stage as scenes come tumbling into memory; visiting, on the eve of his first inauguration, an obscure ship in New York Harbor to ask an old Negro to come with him to Hyde Park and pack his beloved ship prints for the journey to Washington; winding through crowds which press about his slowly moving automobile with their echoing murmur, "I almost touched him"; back from a Pacific cruise, leaning, tanned and smiling, on the bridge of the cruiser Houston as it warps to dock at Portland, Oreg., sighting on shore a Harvard classmate of 30 years ago and calling out as one old grad to another, "Hello, Curtis—class of 1904"; pausing during a speech from the rear platform of his train to explain, "I'll have to wait a minute, there's a grand kid fight going on down here"; reluctantly revealing his election guesses in which he grossly underestimates his own popularity; laughingly arguing with his staff that he could make a better campaign against himself than his opponent does, because he knows his own weaknesses; driving for hours in an open automobile under a drenching rain and dismissing it as a trifle with the remark, "I don't mind having my shoes full of water, but I don't like to sit in a bathtub with my clothes on"; solicitous over the poor, careworn fellow on the curb in Philadelphia who, in a gesture of gratitude, tosses his watch into the automobile; imploring the police to find the man and return it; moving, day after day, in the East and in the West, in the North and in the South, always through seas of countless unknown thousands, a living symbol of democracy;

Who, born in luxury, linked by family to 10 Presidents, has made himself the champion of forgotten men and women, using his talents, as was said of Benjamin Franklin, in an attempt to subdue the ugly facts of society to some more rational scheme of things; at peace with himself and at ease in his job; fixed in purpose, flexible in method; concerned not so much that the rich shall sleep peacefully in their beds but that everyone shall have a bed in which to sleep;

Who, afflicted so that he is unable to move a step without support, is yet a man of action, who has traveled more, been seen and heard by more, been voted for by more free men and women than anyone else before him;

Who wants to bring about in his time a world which shall venture some few paces on into the vistas of hope which science and man's ingenuity have opened to us, to write in the pages of time his small message, as a friend who is with us for a few bright hours before he travels on.

Mr. Speaker, we all know who this man is. The eulogist did not need to name him. I do not need to name him. We all know there is only one living man to whom this matchless eulogy applies.

He is the man who is responsible for the feeble remnant of the once Grand Old Party, and for the most overwhelming Democratic majority in this House of the people's Representatives in the history of the American Congress.

He is the man to whom I pledged my support flat-footed to the last ditch. I hope I may keep the faith; and I hope every Member of this House similarly situated may keep the faith.

Judicial events as of date Monday, March 29, 1937, would seem to justify that faith. The old order changeth. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I have recited the splendid eulogy on the President written by Raymond Clapper, Washington News correspondent, because I felt it worthy of preservation in the permanent records of the Government. It should take a place among great eulogies.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON INTERNAL REVENUE TAXATION

Mr. LAMBETH. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Printing, I send to the desk a privileged resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Concurrent Resolution 7

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurcurring), That in accordance with paragraph 3 of section 2 of the Printing Act approved March 1, 1907, the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation be, and is hereby, empowered to have printed for its use 5,000 additional copies of its report entitled "The Taxing Power of the Federal and State Governments."

Mr. LAMBETH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to introduce this resolution; and I want to thank the chairman of the committee and his colleagues on the committee for reporting this resolution promptly and favorably.

The only purpose I had in mind in introducing this resolution was to perform a real service to the Members of Congress. I hold in my hand a copy of one of the finest pieces of work that I think has been performed by any committee or commission set up by the House. As the title states, it deals with the taxing power of Federal and State Governments. This work has attracted very wide and favorable consideration from experts on taxation. It has had the commendation of deans of law schools throughout the country. It is in fact a monumental work condensed into a small pamphlet of 125 pages.

I know that every Member of the House will be anxious to obtain copies of this work and will wish to study it himself, because it deals with the rules of taxation as construed by the Supreme Court of the United States and deals also with the taxing powers of the States. You undoubtedly will have many requests from constituents and from people particularly interested in the subject of taxation. I hope that this resolution may receive the unanimous support of the House, for I am confident that once you have examined the pamphlet you will feel that your action here today, in supporting this resolution, was a very wise one not only for yourself but also for the people whom you have the honor to represent.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. I yield.

Mr. HARLAN. When was the pamphlet published, and by what committee?

Mr. REED of New York. It was published by the Joint Committee on Taxation, composed of five Members from the Senate and four Members from the House of Representatives.

Mr. HARLAN. When was it issued?

Mr. REED of New York. The edition I hold in my hand was printed in April 1936. It is practically up to date.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, did the gentleman from New York indicate on any previous legislative day that he desired this time?

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Speaker, I refer the gentleman to the majority leader.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

BONDHOLDERS' PROTECTIVE COMMITTEE

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Speaker, I was greatly impressed this morning by the very able patriotic address of the distinguished gentleman from Virginia. I was particularly impressed with his reference to the duty and to the destiny of this House of Representatives. May I say that I am of the belief that the continuance of popular government in America depends upon the integrity, upon the reputation, upon the standing of this House of Representatives. If this House of Representatives fails to meet the popular standards of integrity, then, indeed, is popular government doomed to pass and fascism will come; so it becomes important that the charges made here on this floor a few days since in regard to the integrity of one of its Members, and the integrity of a committee of this House, should be met and met fearlessly. It is true that it is suggested that the gentleman in question simply sought to enjoy a brief hour of limelight. If that was his motive, of course it meets the condemnation and the scorn of all reputable citizens and of all thinking Members of the House.

Some months ago at the request of the distinguished minority leader I went upon this Sabath committee for the purpose of investigating the issues of real estate bonds and the maladministration of the committees that had been in charge. I did so unwillingly, but under the urge of the distinguished minority leader I entered upon that task.

The situation in America then was appalling. Approximately $10,000,000,000 of these bonds were in default. These bonds were held not by the conventional stock market gambler but by people who had reached the evening of life, people who had invested their little all for old-age security, retired school teachers, retired businessmen, under the high-powered salesmanship of that group that peddled these bonds. They were assured that these bonds rested upon the soil, upon the land, and that in their values they were eternal.

So this investment reached to the life savings, to the life earnings of some 4,000,000 people of America, who, as I said, had reached the evening of life.

Mr. Speaker, what did we find in this investigation? We found that bonds totaling some twelve to fourteen billion dollars had in fact been issued on deliberately inflated values. These bonds were predestined to default. When the dark hours of 1929 and subsequent years came they did default.

Then what happened? Protective committees were formed by the houses of issue, which called the bonds in and obtained powers of attorney from these far-scattered bondholders.

What did the protective committees do next? They made a trip to the bank, in most cases the house of issue, and borrowed on these bonds all the tariff would bear. If the issue was for $10,000,000, they borrowed $1,000,000. If the issue was for twenty or thirty million dollars they borrowed a proportionate amount, perhaps 10 or 15 percent. Having obtained this money and doing nothing for the bondholders or nothing to protect these properties or the unhappy investors therein, they made a pilgrimage to the courts and there, on false representation, divided among the lawyers, the trustees and receivers, the proceeds of the loans which, of course, had already prejudiced the standing of the bondholders.

May I say, in passing, that reference has been made to the fact no legislation has been presented or suggested by this committee. That suggestion and statement, of course, falls of its own weight and is unqualifiedly false. I hold in my hand legislation which was introduced early in the last session. It has the endorsement of the Judiciary Committee of the House. This legislation died in the last hours of the Congress. The legislation, may I say, strengthens the arm of the court and does not take away the functions of the court. It gives the court administrative aid in unraveling the labyrinth of these tremendous bond issues, reaching sometimes as high as $50,000,000.

What did these gentlemen who brought about this debacle and peddled these investments to the public do after they had whacked up the proceeds of these loans? The next procedure was to get in bed with some underworld financial crook who desired to take over the property at a nominal sum. The houses of issue sent their bright young men around anew among these same investors and bought these bonds at 8, 10, or 15 cents on the dollar, telling them that the case was hopeless and that they should dispose of the bonds at that time.

The bonds were then turned over by these houses of issue to the real-estate sharks who usually bought the property at 15 cents on the dollar or less. The mortgage was foreclosed, and then another pilgrimage was made to the court and another division of proceeds was made. Thus, the bondholders were wiped out.

Mr. Speaker, I have no criticism to offer of the court, because the court hears these cases ex parte, sometimes 15 or 20 of them of similar magnitude on the same day, has not the machinery for unraveling the facts. One of the suggestions which I hope will be written into legislation at the present session of Congress is one giving the courts, either through the Comptroller's Office or some other agency, administrative and clerical aid for the purpose of putting the courts in possession of all the facts.

Mr. Speaker, this is what was occurring to the bondholders when the committee, which the gentleman from Evanston condemned, came into the picture. Perhaps this committee was not completely formal in some of its performances. I wish the Members of the House could have attended one of these hearings and seen the bondholders who were there present. People past the evening of life, all hope gone, who had invested in these bonds on the theory they had permanent security. I wish the Members might see this group, and perhaps they themselves would not have been very kindly in dealing with these crooks from the financial underworld who were rooking these people.

Mr. MOSER of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOSER of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is making a splendid statement, and I should like to ask him to add at the point he has now reached this fact: When they offered to buy these bonds at 8 or 10 cents on the dollar, what did these people give the poor victims in exchange?

Mr. CULKIN. Sometimes they gave them oil stock that was worthless, of course, and sometimes they gave them 8, 10, or 15 cents on the dollar.

Mr. MOSER of Pennsylvania. Did the gentleman find any instances in which these people received any cash?

Mr. CULKIN. Yes; I think there were some cases. I believe in the California cases they did.

Mr. MOSER of Pennsylvania. There might have been some instances, but they were very remote. In most cases they traded them equally worthless securities.

Mr. CULKIN. Yes. But the significance is that the people this committee found in the saddle, and for whom the gentleman from Evanston ostensibly speaks, were the men who had rooked these people when they sold the bonds. They rooked them, if you please, when they made this pilgrimage to the courts and secured court allowances. They rooked them again when they bought the bonds at a nominal figure and then returned again to their vomit when they sold the investors out and paid them little or nothing on the dollar.

This committee threw itself wholeheartedly into that situation, and I make no apology to the gentleman from Evanston or any other Member of this House for my part in that performance. I believe if that sort of financiering is to be continued in the United States of America, then, indeed, the death knell of this Republic has already struck.

Mr. CHURCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. I will not yield. The gentleman would not yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] the other day, and I cannot yield to him.

I was impressed when I saw these bondholders who were cursing, if you please, the impotence of the Federal and State Governments. When this bond committee came into being we stopped that sort of performance. We were not always polite. We called a spade a spade. We were vigorous, but we stopped the performance. Mr. Speaker, we saved these bondholders at least $2,000,000,000 as a result of our labors.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for 10 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. CULKIN. Of course, these crooks, these bright young men, these high-powered salesmen who put over this thing and participated in this terrible debacle, are resentful of this committee. They feel the committee should be disciplined. They feel it should be smirched. I wish I might have time to review some of the performances which we uncovered. May I say, Mr. Speaker, that in the hearings in which I participated I did not find—and I searched in vain, and have had some experience in this sort of thing——

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. CULKIN. I cannot yield; I am right in the middle of a sentence.

Mr. CHURCH. When the gentleman finishes; pardon me.

Mr. CULKIN. I found but one honest administration. That was the one involving the Press Building here in Washington. May I just recite the case of California? California was not as bad as was the East. California has a corporation commissioner who functions rather admirably. Inflated values were not so terrible in that area. However, I did discover that the men who sold these bonds were the old Strauss outfit, who were still in command—and they were ever getting in bed with the underworld but well-financed types who were waiting for these properties to drop into their laps.

Mr. KRAMER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. I mentioned California, so I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KRAMER. The Strauss outfit which the gentleman has just mentioned, the gentleman perhaps knows originated in Chicago, Ill., close to where the gentleman from Evanston [Mr. CHURCH] resides. They then came to California, imbedded themselves in our country, and started to connive to rob the poor who had put up a few dollars for a rainy day, to take their few dollars away from these poor people by giving them some of these "no good for nothing" bonds.

Mr. CULKIN. Yes; and may I say to the gentleman, in order to complete the story, that our committee by rapid-fire operations drove them out of the picture.

Mr. KRAMER. I know the gentleman is correct on that statement.

Mr. CULKIN. Yes. We drove them out of the picture in California, so the bondholders in California have had a breathing spell.

Mr. KRAMER. However, they are trying to come back again, as the gentleman probably knows.

Mr. CULKIN. We hope to prevent their reappearance.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield.

Mr. CULKIN. I wish I might have time here to go into some of the other proceedings that went on in California and the eastern cities.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. CULKIN. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Illinois for just a question.

Mr. CHURCH. The gentleman did not attend the hearings this last year in Chicago?

Mr. CULKIN. No. I did not go to Chicago. That is right.

Mr. CHURCH. Thank you.

Mr. CULKIN. May I say that Carlyle or some other celebrity stated the press was the virgin daughter of liberty. I suggest to the House that with respect to certain newspapers whose editorials have appeared in this RECORD, that those particular "virgin daughters of liberty" have been seduced so many times they have become members of the oldest profession. [Laughter.] Therefore, I trust the next time we have a Presidential campaign—by the way, I was in Chicago trying to elect Landon with all my might—some of these papers which are referred to here will be against the Republican candidate. I think their opposition will be good for 500,000 additional Republican votes in the city of Chicago. So these editorials do not mean anything. They are just the same old hog-wash on the part of the newspapers, which have completely lost the confidence of the public.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. As the gentleman is well aware, considerable has been said, which is not a part of the record, attacking the integrity of the committee as well as besmirching the character of the chairman of this committee.

Mr. CULKIN. May I interpolate here that, with the consent of the Chair, I am going to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHURCH] if he does attack the members of the committee other than the chairman?

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I certainly do not attack any member of the committee, including the chairman, except insofar as stated in my remarks last Thursday, and anyone reading those remarks will see that I quote from records, which is as far as I go. When this committee started I had the highest respect for its good intentions. If the gentleman now holding the floor had been on the committee at its hearings in Chicago last year, I would have had much more respect for its proceedings there.

May I say further I call on this committee to bring legislation to the floor this session. I went to the Judiciary Committee this morning when the gentleman from New York [Mr. CULKIN] was not there and when no other member of the select committee was present except the chairman and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN]——

Mr. CULKIN. May I say right there I was attending a session of another committee?

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I went there to urge legislation. I hope legislation in behalf of the bondholders is brought before the House. I hold no brief for these other people the gentleman condemns.

Thank you for this opportunity to make a statement. I am sorry the gentleman from New York [Mr. CULKIN] did not come to Chicago to attend any of the hearings held this last year by the committee. The gentleman has just stated that perhaps this committee was not completely ethical in some of its performances. Please develop that.

Mr. CULKIN. I understand the Chicago situation, but I could not get there. The proceedings there were in good hands.

Mr. CHURCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. No; I am sorry.

May I say to the gentleman that I received a thousand letters of protest against the oppressive methods in Chicago of that sacred codfish, the Chicago Title & Trust Co. Many of these letters suggested there was a collusive relation between the Chicago Title & Trust Co. and certain members of the Federal bench. I do not say there was such a relation, but this was the claim which was made.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. No; I cannot yield any more. I am sorry.

Mr. CHURCH. I will ask for more time for the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. CHURCH. They adjourned on me.

Mr. CULKIN. Now, in the conduct of the affairs of this committee, I have been greatly impressed with the sound character and absolute decency of the distinguished chairman, Judge SABATH. [Applause.] I am going to stay on the side of Judge SABATH in this controversy. I have not always agreed with Judge SABATH on the proceedings of this committee. We have differed.

May I say that reference has been made to the $110,000 that was given this committee? We had, you may say, hundreds of thousands of inquiries requiring a great clerical force, and we also had travel expenses. In New York recently they had a district attorney superseded by a new prosecutor who conducted an investigation and the lawyers in that case were paid $100,000 for one murder case.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York may proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Speaker, I believe the sum allowed this committee for the vast field it covered was nominal. I believe the sum should have been greater. I also believe that when a committee of this kind, with duties of such magnitude, is put to work, it should employ the best counsel that is available in America, an outstanding man with a flair for the rights, if you please, of the common man, a real lawyer of a seagoing type so far as the humanities are concerned. I believe this would be conducive to a more orderly investigation. I insist that, working with the tools it had, this committee has done a splendid job; not always, perhaps, entirely formal in its methods, but ever on the side of the bondholders, and ever against these oppressive, high-powered groups, these ghouls who were picking the carcasses of these properties even as did the carpetbaggers that of the fallen Confederacy.

I salute Judge SABATH, and I resent, with all the force of which I am capable, this unjust attack upon him. I am fond of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHURCH], and I regret this mistaken stand on his part.

Mr. FARLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. I yield.

Mr. FARLEY. This attack on Judge SABATH has been in the making for many months. I happen to have some connections with an investment banker in Chicago, and I know. Do not let anything happen now that will make the bondholders' committee look lily white and you gentlemen look black.

Mr. CULKIN. No; and that is why I am speaking here today. I would not have taken up this time except for the fact we must not lose the ground we have gained. If anybody chooses to get in bed with these thieves and this financial underworld, this committee will lash them unsparingly.

I believe out of this discussion and out of this investigation will come splendid things for the moderate investor of America. As I see it, however, unless the brakes are put on these crooks—and I use the word feelingly and advisedly—it seems to me that the very continuance of our Government is, in fact, imperiled. [Applause.]

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CULKIN] be extended 1 minute for a question.

Mr. O'MALLEY. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I have served on the Sabath committee from its inception. I have attended every hearing in Chicago, every hearing in Detroit and in Milwaukee, and some of the hearings in New York and Philadelphia. I could speak an hour this afternoon upon the accomplishments of the distinguished chairman of the committee, and when it was all over it could be boiled down into these words: I have found him to be of unimpeachable integrity ever since he has been a member of the committee and ever since he has been a Member of this House. [Applause.]

It is not necessary for me to defend the chairman of this committee. It is not necessary for me to defend myself or my colleagues on the committee. It is not necessary for me to defend any Member of this House. I say categorically that when the day comes that it shall be necessary for me to defend the integrity of anybody in this House, perhaps I ought to walk out of that door. One comes here in his first term flushed with victory and somehow suffused with a certain eagerness to buckle on the armor and the mail of Sir Galahad and go out as a crusader and a reformer. For a little while one may be a bit of an opportunist, given to close discernment of political expediency that might enhance his political fortunes in his district and in his State. In a little while, as you mature and mellow among the membership of this House, you begin to cherish a high regard for the superb integrity that exists here, and the longer I serve the more impressive becomes the individual and collective integrity of this body. So it is not necessary for me to defend my distinguished colleague from Illinois, the chairman of this committee. He and his 30-year record of service are their own defense.

I shall allude to only one thing that may be of interest. This committee delved into a situation in one of the Northeastern States where men, who it is alleged bore my own party label, had been dipping into the treasury of a defunct corporation long after it had gone into insolvency, and dissipated the money of the stockholders to the extent of several million dollars. It came to our attention just shortly before election day, 1934. The distinguished chairman of this committee, who is a Democrat, out of respect for any sensibility that the minority members might have and to repel the faintest breath of suspicion that the committee was being used as an instrument for political advantage, said to us that he would let this matter ride until election day was over. Mr. Arthur Brisbane, of lamented memory, great editorialist and columnist, learned of this affair and assaulted our chairman editorially in all of the Hearst newspapers of the country. It is only added evidence of the great and fine spirit with which the chairman conducted this committee and how solicitous he was about the interests of the minority members.

He has labored early and late, in season and out, at the expense of his own health to achieve an excellent piece of work. He has listened patiently to the pathetic stories of humble people and fought courageously in their behalf. No one can divest him of that glory.

I shall not trespass upon the time of the House further this afternoon except to say that in my estimation this attack is lamentable, it was regrettable, it was ill advised, it was unfounded. And, oh, how tragic, how sad, among the membership of this House, where a fine spirit and feeling have always prevailed, that we among ourselves by such intemperate and unfounded attack should add to the distrust and to the suspicion in the world in this joyous Easter season. [Applause.]

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL, 1938

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5966) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and for other purposes. Pending that, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be equally divided between and controlled by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. POWERS] and myself, and that general debate continue throughout the day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 5966. Pending that, he asks unanimous consent that general debate upon the bill shall continue during the remainder of the day, one-half the time to be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. POWERS]. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from California.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 5966, with Mr. LUCAS in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 15 minutes.

We come now to the consideration of a supply bill which has to do entirely with our own official housekeeping. The Bureau of the Budget, in this one particular instance, has no jurisdiction to review the appropriations for our own expenditures. This bill is peculiar in that respect. The law exempts the estimates of appropriations for the legislative branch from Executive control. For that reason, as well as the desire to omit all unnecessary items, the Subcommittee on Appropriations for the legislative establishment, and your chairman, have tried their best to curtail appropriations without doing any great injury to the operations of the Government so far as they apply to us. As is well understood, this supply bill cares for the Senate expenses in all of the ramifications of its activities, for the House of Representatives, the Capitol Police force, the Joint Committee on Printing, the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, the office of the legislative counsel, the Architect of the Capitol, the Botanic Garden and the Library of Congress, and last the Government Printing Office. The total of the estimates considered by the committee in the preparation of the bill was $24,947,764. This sum is composed of $24,558,166 transmitted in the regular Budget, only in a formal way, but there were supplemental estimates totaling $389,598. The amount of money recommended to be appropriated by this supply bill is $24,001,734, and compared with the appropriation for 1937 that sum is $1,413,724 less than for the current fiscal year; and, interesting to note, it is $946,030 less than the total amount of the estimates. I doubt very much whether any supply bill that has come before you, or will come before you in this session of Congress, will show a greater proportional decrease under the appropriations for 1937.

At this juncture I pause to give my meed of thanks to the members of the subcommittee who are associated with me—Mr. POWERS, of New Jersey, on the Republican side of this committee; Mr. RABAUT, of Michigan; Mr. FERNANDEZ, of Louisiana; and Mr. SNYDER of Pennsylvania. Mr. SNYDER, in the latter days of our hearings, was elevated to the position of membership on Subcommittee for Deficiencies of the Committee on Appropriations, and in his place the chairman of our committee selected the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOUSTON]. To these gentlemen is due largely the credit of the preparation of this appropriation bill.

When you read the report you will note that so far as Senate items are concerned, we have not, as members of the subcommittee of the House for the legislative establishment, done anything whatsoever. The custom has been, through the years, to let the Senate take care of its own fiscal necessities. So, in mentioning the Senate operations and Senate expenditures, I shall pass over them very quickly. The amount recommended, however, for the Senate for 1938 is $3,334,084, which is $284,000 less than the current year and $600 under the Budget estimate.

The House of Representatives is awarded a total of $8,308,078, a net reduction of $19,030 under the 1937 appropriation and $20,690 below the estimates.

In a very cursory way I shall give you the break-down of the House of Representatives total.

Under the first heading comes Members' salaries, where the amount is the same. Members' mileage, which is the same as previous years. Salaries for the Speaker's office, which is the same; Speaker's table expenditures, amounting to the same. Clerk's office salaries, amounting to the same. Annual employees of committees, an increase of $3,480, which increase was provided for by a resolution of the House at this session. Sergeant at Arms' office, the amount is the same. House Office Building police force, for the same items. Doorkeeper's office, the same. Special and minority employees, the same as last year. The post office of the House of Representatives, an addition of $360.

In this case we provided the postmaster of the House of Representatives with an additional registry and money-order clerk. He had been giving this service in both the new and the old House Office Buildings, where there are branches of the post office, but he had no money-order clerk in the House Office Building, and he used one of his messengers for this service. We felt that, since this service was being rendered adequately by this messenger, we would provide the salary he had been receiving prior to a decision of the Comptroller General.

Official reporters of debates, the expenditure is increased by $2,760. This is accounted for by a resolution adopted in the House of Representatives last year. The committee stenographers have an increase of $1,920, due to a House resolution respecting their office. Members and Delegates' clerk hire is the same as last year and previous years.

So far as the contingent expenses of the House of Representatives are concerned, we have had to increase the item of furniture repairs and furniture in the sum of $18,950, $2,200 of which will go to new equipment in connection with the improvements which will take place in the press gallery if this supply bill is passed.

The packing-box item is the same. The miscellaneous items, however, show an increase from $75,000 to $95,000, or a total of $20,000. This is due principally to the fact, as you Members understand, that when the death of some employee occurs it has been the rule to give the widow or the family of that employee 6 months' salary and an allowance for funeral expenses. We have had more than the normal amount of deaths in the past year.

Reporting hearings is exactly the same as last year.

Expenses of special committees—it might be interesting to note what the committee has done in that regard. Last year we gave to the contingent fund $100,000. This year we have only provided $60,000, or a decrease of $40,000. According to our committee hearings it developed that a very small part of the $100,000, awarded in last year's bill for current expenditures for special committee expenses, had been spent, so we reduced the amount accordingly. We think that the special committees now operating under resolution of the House of Representatives will be able to get along with this sum, unless, of course, the House of Representatives might deem it necessary to appoint more of these special committees of investigation.

The Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation has an increase of $2,000. Mr. Parker, in charge of this activity, came before our committee and said he felt that because of the tremendous interest which the Nation is taking in revenue enactments and in the revenue laws so far passed by this administration, it was necessary for him to have this extra sum in order adequately to serve the Committee on Finance and the Committee on Ways and Means.

Telephone and telegraph is the same as last year, $95,000. It does seem like a lot of money for our establishment to expend in telephone and telegraph. It is no more than last year. It is no more than previous years, but I might at this juncture admonish the Members of the House of Representatives that very frequently they might be able to conduct their official business by correspondence instead of finding it necessary at all junctures to send telegrams. I have thought, and it was discussed in our committee, that perhaps Members of the House should be given an opportunity to utilize air mail instead of the telegraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 additional minutes.

As chairman of the subcommittee I thought of this expediency, that the Postmaster General might be authorized by law to give each Member of the House a certain number of token air-mail stamps.

I know that if a Member of the House, particularly one from the West, had available air-mail stamps to attach to his communications, knowing that they would be delivered in the .West the next morning, he would consider it as good a service as the telegraph. It is, however, only a thought I cast into these remarks; but I feel that this intermediary service of a token air-mail stamp privilege on the part of the Congressmen might save a considerable sum of money which would otherwise annually have to be appropriated to take care of telegraph bills.

The rest of that item, stationery, is the same; medical supplies are the same; postage for officers is the same; folding speeches is the same; editing the code is the same; services, various compilations is the same; the amount allowed for the Speaker's automobile is the same, and the amount allowed for portraits of Speakers of the House is the same.

The item, Capitol Police, is not increased whatsoever. The joint committee on inaugural ceremonies this year is eliminated. The amount awarded to the Joint Committee on Government Organization is eliminated this year because of the creation of a special committee of the Congress having in its membership both Senators and Representatives, and which is now making this study. We are giving the office of the legislative counsel the same money it has received heretofore, the amount for salaries and expenses being the same, and the amount for statement of appropriations being the same.

We have, however, granted an increase to the Architect of the Capitol. The Architect of the Capitol requested an item of $7,868 to make certain improvements in the House press gallery. Similar improvements were made 2 years ago in the Senate press gallery. These improvements are very much needed and the alterations in the House press gallery will be made by the Architect of the Capitol under the terms of this bill.

Air conditioning: No further appropriations for air conditioning are necessary because a sufficient amount has been heretofore provided. The work is under contract and we are informed that the air conditioning should be finished by June of this year.

Included under the Architect of the Capitol is a large item for the Capitol power plant. We find that an additional sum of $313,750 is needed to take care of a new steam-line conduit to the new annex of the Government Printing Office and the new Government Printing Office warehouse. We questioned the Architect very closely on this subject, feeling that, perhaps, a power plant established down there might in a cheaper manner take care of the heating and lighting expenses of these new buildings, but the Procurement Division of the Treasury made a study of the subject and reported that it would be better to make the extension of the steam lines from the Capitol power plant than to install a separate power plant at the Government Printing Office.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 additional minutes.

We now come to the Library of Congress. After careful consideration we have awarded to the Librarian, Dr. Putnam, who is doing such a splendid job in developing and dignifying with his great talents and his fine institution, the Library of Congress, 18 new employees. He asked for 41 new employees. He asked for 41 new employees last year and the year previously, but we have not given him any additional help for several years. We find now that it is absolutely necessary so to do, particularly in the catalog and classification divisions. He finds that many items and accretions to his Library are bottlenecked in these particular departments. As you know, two copies of every book that is copyrighted in the Copyright Office under his jurisdiction are deposited in the Library of Congress. During the course of a year this represents many thousands of books. The accumulations in the Library are so great that, of necessity, these books and whatever gifts are made to the Library—and there are many during the course of a year, some very splendid gifts on the part of people who have spent their lives in collecting works—that these books could not be treated, could not be cataloged with the help available. Needless to say, those items are of no service to the Nation or to ourselves as Members of Congress, or to the Government departments if they cannot be found, even though we have them there; and they cannot be found if they are not cataloged and classified. So, of these 18 new employees, we gave him 9 for the Catalog Division and 3 for the Document Division. We gave the Law Library 1 extra clerk.

We allowed the Library a general sum of $100,000 for the purchase of new books and we allowed the Law Library $60,000 for additional law material.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HARLAN. How does that compare with the allowance that we gave them last year?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. We gave him $115,000 last year for general increase and $50,000 for law.

Mr. HARLAN. How does that compare with similar libraries such as the Harvard law library, for example, or the University of Michigan?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. The Harvard Law Library has but one operation; that is the collection and accumulation of law books. I just stated that we allowed $60,000 to the law library. This makes a total allowance of $160,000 for accessions.

Mr. HARLAN. What I have in mind, if the gentleman has the time, is that the law library of Harvard University spends in the neighborhood of $100,000 a year. It is hopeless for us to try to maintain an adequate law library on an allowance of $60,000 a year.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. The year before last we allowed $90,000 and last year $50,000. If you will read the hearings with respect to the law library, you will find that we have had splendid justification for the increment of $10,000, but since the committee did not increase the amount of money awarded to the general library, and decreased the allowance from $115,000 to $100,000, we felt we were not justified in a greater increase to the law library than $10,000.

I hope that answers the gentleman's question.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 1 additional minute.

It can be readily understood that in this very brief statement it is difficult to take up every item of appropriation. We have increased the salaries of 260 employees at the request of the Architect of the Capitol, these employees being under his jurisdiction and compensated under the Classification Act; but in no case have we allowed increases in grades where the step-ups were more than $60 per annum and in no case where the $60 would build the salary beyond $2,000. The committee has been very sympathetic with all of the low-paid employees.

If there are any questions I shall be glad to answer them as best I can.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, for the past several weeks Hon. Emanuel Quezon, President of the Philippine Commonwealth, has been in this country. Recently he was the guest of honor at a large dinner given by our former colleague and popular friend, Hon. Harry B. Hawes. Those attending the dinner were, for the most part, the Members of both branches of Congress who were present at President Quezon's inauguration in November 1935.

In the course of his remarks at this dinner, Mr. Quezon spoke of the eventual complete independence of the Philippines. Since then he has been quoted as saying that he and his fellow countrymen would be gratified to have this condition become an accomplished fact during the next 2 years.

Probably this possibility has been the subject of conversations between representatives of the State Department and Mr. Quezon. It is rumored the President of the United States is considering a trip to the islands in the autumn, which would indicate that the administration desires to study conditions there at first hand.

It is not too early to bring this subject to the attention of Congress. While I am in no way a student of far eastern problems, it was my good fortune to have been a member of the congressional party attending President Quezon's inauguration in 1935. My personal observations gave me some very definite opinions. But before expressing them let me very briefly sketch the background.

As everyone knows, the Philippines came into our possession as a result of the War with Spain in 1898. We fought that country in the capacity of an elder brother protecting our island neighbors to the southeast, the people of Cuba. When war was declared Commodore George Dewey was in command of a small squadron of American vessels off the coast of China. He sailed at once for the Philippines, which were then a Spanish possession. In the face of the supposedly impregnable defenses of Manila Harbor, both on land and sea, he made an attack on the Spanish vessels and won a complete victory.

Dewey's success at Manila, combined with continuous victories in Cuba, in which Col. Theodore Roosevelt and Lieutenant Hobson were the outstanding heroes, soon terminated the war. The Philippines fell into our laps. What to do with them has been a problem ever since.

After much hesitation, President McKinley's administration decided to hold the Philippines as a dependency. This was a new policy for the United States, and was at once attacked by many in this country as imperialism. On the other hand, it was argued that the Filipinos were not fit for self-government, and that American sentiment would not tolerate returning the islands to Spain.

We have here in our own country ample area to take care of our people. We are not a colonizing nation, but we are a sympathetic people. For 39 years we have controlled the islands, gradually increasing their rights of self-government.

After the surrender of Manila to Commodore Dewey a provisional American government was set up. However, undisputed control was not established at once due to the Filipino Insurrection. In 1899 the first Philippine Commission was appointed by President McKinley to study conditions in the islands and recommend a course of action. The next year a second commission, known as the Taft Commission, was appointed to assume both legislative and executive functions in the islands. Later William Howard Taft, who headed the second commission, was named the first civil governor of the islands.

The legislative functions were retained by the civil commission until 1907, when, under the Cooper Act, the first elective assembly was inaugurated. The legislature then consisted of this elective assembly as the lower house and the civil commission as the upper house, the latter being presided over by the Governor General. In 1913 the share of the Filipino people in their government was enlarged further when they were given a majority of the appointees on the civil commission, thus enabling them to control both branches of the legislature.

Under the Jones law, passed in 1916, the Philippine Commission was abolished and the Philippine Senate created in its stead. This placed the legislative function completely in the hands of the Filipinos themselves. The Governor General, however, continued to act as the chief executive officer, but was relieved of his duties as presiding officer of the upper legislative body.

This form of government continued until November 15, 1935, when the Commonwealth of the Philippines was inaugurated under the Independence Act passed by Congress in 1934.

Mr. Chairman, we have spent fabulous sums in making the Filipinos an independent people. For defense, for sanitation, for education, and for all the attributes of improvement and development we have been most generous. On February 20, 1934, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KLEBERG] inserted in the RECORD a table showing the expenditures of the United States on account of the Philippine Islands. This table, which was prepared by the Bureau of Insular Affairs of the War Department, shows that from May 1, 1898, through June 30, 1933, we had spent a total of $822,000,000 for and on account of the Philippine Islands, not counting the $20,000,000 which we paid to Spain on their cession to us following the Spanish-American War. Think of it—nearly a billion dollars!

Not only have we spent hundreds of millions of dollars in the Philippines in the interest of the Filipino people, but we have contributed further to their wealth by consistently buying more of their products than they have bought from us. In this connection I quote the following paragraph from the recent report of the United States Tariff Commission on United States-Philippine trade:

> The Philippines have generally sold more goods to the United States than they have purchased from the United States. Their credit trade balance with the United States amounted to $47,800,000 in 1933, $42,500,000 in 1934, and $20,770,000 in 1935.

During the entire time we have had the Philippine Islands under our jurisdiction the people of the islands who would wield power there have been urging independence. Every President of the United States, from McKinley to Franklin D. Roosevelt, has favored eventual independence. Acting upon their advice, Congress from time to time has endeavored to legislate toward that end.

In the Seventy-second Congress a bill was passed providing for Philippine independence, but certain conditions contained therein were not approved by the Filipinos in a referendum on the measure. With slight changes, the same measure was again passed in the Seventy-third Congress and submitted to the Filipino people and was this time accepted. The outstanding provisions of the Independence Act are as follows:

First. Authorization for the adoption of a constitution and the institution of the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands pending the withdrawal of American sovereignty and the establishment of complete independence at the end of 10 years.

Second. After 10 years, the final and complete independence of the Philippines is to be recognized.

Third. A High Commissioner to be appointed to represent the United States in the islands pending complete independence.

Fourth. Pending independence, trade relations between the Philippines and the United States to be on the same basis as previously existing, except that quotas for free entry of Philippine sugar, coconut oil, and cordage are established, amounts imported in excess of quotas to be subject to regular duties.

Fifth. After the Philippines have become fully independent, the regular tariff duties on foreign imports are to apply to Philippine products; provided, that at least 1 year prior to independence a trade conference between Philippine and American representatives shall be held to discuss and make recommendations regarding future trade relations.

Sixth. The United States to relinquish all military reservations in the islands upon the establishment of complete independence, with the discretionary right to retain and maintain naval bases and fueling stations.

Mr. Chairman, I will say frankly that I have grave doubts whether the vast majority of the Filipinos are competent to pass judgment upon so momentous a question as whether they wish to be a free and independent nation and assume all the burdens and responsibilities incident thereto. Of course, the Filipinos with whom we come in contact in this country, as well as those with whom visitors to the islands normally come in contact, are an educated and cultivated group. But there are really three classes of Filipinos. There is the small percentage of very brilliant and highly educated leaders. Then there is a moderately small percentage of what might be termed the "middle class", composed of clerks, storekeepers, and so on. Finally, there is the very large percentage of what would appear to the average American as the uncivilized group. This latter class inhabits the hundreds of islands which make up the Philippine Archipelago.

When visiting the Philippines in 1935 it was my privilege to make two excursions into the country, one to Baggio, which is about 150 miles north of Manila. The other lay to the southeast, across the country toward the Pacific Ocean. On both these excursions I very distinctly came in contact with the real life of the islanders. I do not believe that people living as these natives do, where women are put to work crushing stones by hand power for the repair of roads, and where the men sit almost naked by their huts with only a shirt and gee string, are able to make so important a decision as the one they were required to make under the Independence Act. Nor do I believe that people whose only cover is a shack made by sticking a few bamboo poles in the ground and laying some rattan strips for flooring, with thatched roof above, live under conditions suitable for independence. The result will be that while we are supposed to have set up a republic, in effect we are acquiescing in an oligarchy, because the few of the first class I have mentioned are sure to control the entire civil structure.

But these opinions of mine are not important now. The fact is that, whether for good or bad, a majority of the Filipino people have by their mandate accepted the provisions of the Independence Act and have set up a government under their own constitution. As I have already said, they will have complete independence in 10 years.

Some of the Filipino leaders are now becoming restless and want independence sooner—within 2 years. They also want to secure modification of the Independence Act in other respects.

Mr. Chairman, I, for one, fail to see what is to be accomplished by a continuation of our 10,000-mile remote, indefinite control over the Philippines before actual independence comes. I can, of course, see its benefit to the Filipinos, but I can see no existing obligation on our part to assume further responsibility for their safety from internal or external attacks. If the Filipino people want independence in 2 years, I am in favor of givng it to them.

Of course, the Filipino people would be glad to have their cake and eat it, too. They would like to be independent, but they hesitate to shoulder the responsibilities of independence themselves. However, speaking as an American legislator, I cannot approve of that situation. This Government has to all intents and purposes turned over to the Filipinos the right to govern themselves but, at the same time, we continue to be responsible to the nations of the world for the well-being of the islands. This involves military, naval, and partial civil control. It involves the possibility of the conduct of the Filipino people aggravating some nation to the extent of bringing about hostilities, which would require American intervention and action. We should not have an American protectorate over the islands for 10 years which has such possibilities of trouble, expense, and unnamed difficulties. I am ready at any moment to vote for a reduction of the 10-year period before Philippine independence becomes an accomplished fact. The shorter the period, not to exceed 3 years, the better.

The Filipino people want one-sided independence. They want independence without responsibility. They want to be free, but they want to continue to receive the economic and military advantages they receive by being an American protectorate. I, for one, would not consent to that kind of an arrangement. Either the Philippines should be free or they should not. And if they are to be free, the sooner the better.

So far as other modifications of the Independence Act are concerned, I express no opinion except as they may apply to changes in the tariff arrangements provided. I would be absolutely opposed to granting further tariff concessions to the Filipinos. It should not be forgotten that one of the major considerations in granting independence was that our farmers and workers would not thereafter have to suffer from free and unbridled competition with competitive Philippine products produced by cheap oriental labor.

There is no question but what the thought of being on a foreign-country basis so far as our tariff laws are concerned, beginning in 1945, is one of the things that is most disturbing to the Filipinos in connection with their independence. They want to continue to have free access to the rich American market and undoubtedly we will be asked to make some exceptions in their behalf. Perhaps Secretary Hull will extend the "good-neighbor policy" of the Reciprocal Tariff Act to the Philippines and thereby nullify the tariff policy set up by Congress in the Independence Act. Of course, until 1945 our tariff wall will not apply, and, in the meantime, some of us hope to see the Reciprocal Tariff Act repealed.

It is probable that the Filipino people may soon rue the day when they adopted the referendum granting them independence. That remains to be seen. From the purely business standpoint, the American taxpayer has reason to rue the day we took jurisdiction over the islands, since, as I have pointed out, we have spent nearly a billion dollars in protecting and promoting the welfare of the Filipino people. However, we are a charitable people, and it was only our interest in protecting the weak against the strong that led us into the war which brought the Philippines under our jurisdiction. Hence, I would not suggest that we are glad to get rid of the Philippines purely from the business standpoint.

While the Filipinos may some day rue their independence, there are also large American interests in the islands which do not relish the idea of losing American control and protection. In 1935, according to the United States Tariff Commission, the total American investments in the islands amounted to $163,000,000. Mining investments represent 23 percent of this total; public utilities, 19 percent; sugar, 12 percent; plantations, 12 percent; and merchandising, 11 percent. These five industries account for over three-quarters of the total American investment.

I do not see where we have any responsibility to protect these investments. They were made by people who were familiar with the uncertainty as to the time when we would relinquish control over the islands, and they took the risk that some day American protection would no longer be furnished. I, for one, would not vote to send any American troops for war purposes outside the continental United States, and I am opposed to sending soldiers to the Philippines to protect $163,000,000 of American investments.

Mr. Chairman, in closing, I repeat, if the Filipinos want independence now, instead of in 1945, give it to them; but they should be independent rather than under the further protection of our people and our flag. [Applause.]

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COOLEY].

A DRAMATIZATION OF CRIME—A ROMANCE OF VIOLENCE

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, once again I am about to abuse your patience by asking that you hear me for a few brief moments as I discuss a very novel and profoundly important subject, the Sit-Down Strike; a Dramatization of Crime, a Romance of Violence.

It is very difficult by logic or learning, by the fluency of words or the elegance of diction, or even by the sparkling language of eloquence, to stop or to stay the strong arm of violence. I appreciate, therefore, the weakness of words even when spoken in this historic forum. Mere words when spoken even by the chief executive of a sovereign State appear to be impotent and as sounding brass and tinkling cymbals when directed to the lawless spirit which is responsible for the great demonstration of violence which is now prevalent in certain sections of the Nation.

What I am about to say, therefore, will have little or no effect upon those who are responsible for the condition of which I complain. Your hearing me will perhaps serve but one purpose, that of permitting me the privilege of audible expression of my disapproval of certain vicious assaults which are now being committed upon the majesty of the law.

The tyranny of a mob is as odious as is the tyranny of a monarch. There is no place for either in this Republic. In this Nation the only emperor, the only king, the only sovereign, is the majesty of the law, and for it all men must have reverence and respect. Only by maintaining law will we be able to protect our institutions, our properties, our homes, our reputations, and our lives.

As Congressmen we are champions of the law, the law under which our Nation has grown great and without which our Nation will perish. This is a government of law. The law is the bulwark of our strength—the safeguard of our liberty. The law must at all hazards be maintained and vindicated.

America is an asylum for the oppressed of every land, and nowhere else beneath the bending sky is there another such haven. When law is destroyed America is lost and humanity's last and best hope is gone. I therefore desire to ask this question: Shall we remain silent when the basic fabric of our civilization is threatened by an alien spirit which is incompatible with the genius of our Government? Shall the enemies of law and order continue to occupy the center of the stage while we, the guardians of the law, remain silent?

I, for one, cannot feign an indifference to this perilous situation which exists. I, for one, cannot accept with smug complacency these outrages upon constituted authority. Nor can I countenance these assaults upon the law. This dramatization of crime, this romance of violence is ladened with evil and loaded with dynamite.

I realize that from a superficial view one might become unduly alarmed and discouraged. While I do not believe that this lawless spirit will devour our civilization, yet I behold a solemn and impressive spectacle, a spectacle which I hope I may discuss with some degree of temperance.

I am admonished to be tolerant; to have patience; to be charitable. While I realize that charity is the paramount virtue and in tolerance there is something of the divine, I am unable to accept philosophically the conditions that exist and by accepting, encourage them. Those who love the law and our great American institutions will not yield to the suggestion that they be tolerant while the law is flaunted and private property is confiscated in a high-handed and unlawful manner.

If we are to permit our forbearance to cause us to tolerate the tactics and technique which are employed by those who are infatuated by a lust for power; if we are to permit our institutions to be prostituted; the law to be lynched and public justice to be outraged; if we are to admit that the battalions of the law are unable to withstand the onslaughts of violence, we might as well tear from the walls of our courtrooms the ancient and classic form of the Goddess of Justice and throw it into the street to be trampled upon by the hoofs of communism, which will finally grind this Republic into pulp.

In this conquest those who are responsible for this lawlessness are neither commissioned nor commanded by a fiat of fate, but are moved only by a thirst for power which causes them to want to rule or ruin. I was very much pleased to read in the morning paper that William Green, a responsible labor leader, has expressed very definitely his disapproval of sit-down strikes, thus showing that he is a real friend of labor.

Surely America is at the cross road. One road leads to restoration and reform. The other leads to Moscow and to Rome; to repudiation and to revolution and to the jungles of anarchy. In this crisis our choice is clear. If this lawless spirit has the audacity to invade the courtroom in an effort to intimidate the judge upon the bench, and is permitted to do so with impunity, it may soon invade this sacred Chamber and the legislative halls in the 48 States.

Who can speak the language of tolerance when all that the Nation holds dear is threatened; when beautiful and noble reverences are destroyed in the minds of groups of our citizens; when the courts are challenged as cowards and public justice is made a mockery? Who can be patient when the will and the impulse to obey the law is annihilated in the breast of men; when hatred and distrust is engendered in the public mind; when the courts are intimidated and justice sits trembling in its ancient citadel and the very foundations of the temple of free government shiver in the presence of reckless and wanton men?

Unless this spirit of lawlessness is checked and stopped our ship of state will soon be sailing in shallow waters and will crash upon the sunken rocks of communism. If men are to be permitted to take the law in one hand while they brandish a bush ax or a shotgun in the other and openly set law at defiance while they seek to accomplish by force and violence that which the slow processes of the law denies them, neither your home nor my home, nor the home of the humblest citizen will longer be safe and secure from the ravages of reckless men. We will no longer have a government of law but only a land of lawlessness and chaos.

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOLEY. I yield briefly for a question.

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. The gentleman speaks of his reverence for the majesty of the law. Has the gentleman signed the petition for the consideration of the anti-lynching bill?

Mr. COOLEY. I have not; and, furthermore, I have never signed a petition to take any bill from any standing committee of this House. I am not talking about an antilynching law. I am trying to drive home the fact that the law itself is being lynched by mobs in certain sections of the country.

I have no apology to make for my friendship for labor. My labor record is as good as that of any man or woman in this House. If I may express my sentiment with reference to the subject by paraphrasing the language of Lord Mansfield, I will say: "The air of America is too pure to be breathed by an economic slave." I yield to no man my sympathy for the underprivileged. Labor's cause is a just and righteous cause, but its high objectives must be accomplished by reason rather than by brute force. Group action often intensifies the vices rather than the virtues of men. I am very much afraid that the moral psychology will be adversely, potently, and permanently affected by these insurrections against the State. While I am a friend of organized labor, I cannot go along with those who would pervert and prostitute its high purposes. Once again may I reiterate the warning of the wise man of old—"Where there is no vision, the people perish; but he that keepeth the law, happy is he."

A peaceful termination of these battles is a consummation devoutly to be wished. I hope that labor will achieve greater victories and more lasting laurels than it is now accomplishing by temporarily staying the arm of the law. Labor must draw its own specifications, chart its own course, and be its own architect. It will be ruled by reason or ruined by recklessness.

Lip love for labor is not sufficient. Labor's problem is national in its scope and we must in justice and of necessity establish an adequate mediation system to the end that labor may be accorded the due processes of law and given its day in court. This must be done and it must be done now. It must be done by law and not by force of arms. Labor must be given a place in the sun.

If the evils of the economic system under which we are living have driven honest American workers to the desperation of outlaws, surely the evils must be eradicated and the systems must be improved. If industry has displayed a medieval disregard of the rights and privileges of those it employs, the laboring man has a right to look to the Government and to the law for a correction of the system under which he is forced to live. If industry has armed itself with blackjacks, tear gas, machine guns, and other deadly weapons for the purpose of an offensive warfare against the lawful rights of the laboring man, then America must unarm industry and strip it of its deadly weapons and unlawful purposes. As we cannot tolerate the confiscation of private property by labor, neither can we tolerate gas bombs and shotguns in the hands of hired strikebreakers aiding industry in its indefensible violation of the human and lawful rights of men.

Again I repeat, these struggles and these controversies must be settled upon the basis of right reason, human justice, and common sense, and under laws characterized by simplicity and equality.

If we believe in the perpetuity of our Nation we must believe in the necessity of preserving the law, the foundation upon which it rests—our governmental structure.

The crisis calls for courage. May the hearts of statesmen be brave. May reason rule and relieve and ransom the oppressed of this Nation as we go forth to retrieve the law.

If we as lawmakers are willing to give aid and comfort to the lawless spirit which is permeating this Nation today, we should resign our commissions, hang our heads in shame, and join the ranks of those who would defile and despoil the heritage which we hold in trust for posterity. Shall statesmen lie in lethargy while ills and evils flourish and spawn a multitude of other wrongs, or shall we by bold and courageous action and under the rule of reason correct them?

I think that it is well-settled law in the United States that when an undertaking which is privately organized and privately owned and operated becomes charged with a public interest, then the public may supervise and control it—not by force and arms but by law. If this is true, why, then, cannot either the State or the Federal Government establish by law maximum hours, minimum wages, and the abolition of sweatshops?

Corporations are creatures of the law. They derive their power from the State, and surely the State has not created a "Frankenstein" which is to rise up in its might and power and destroy its creator. Corporations are legal entities, and as such are impressed with a moral and public responsibility. If the power granted to corporations to use is actually abused and the corporation in the exercise of its granted corporate power abuses the rights and the privileges of men and women who, by the necessities of their situations, are forced to earn their livelihoods by working for this creature of the law, and by doing so have undermined and impaired their health and that of their children yet to be born by working under undesirable conditions, and for long hours under a speed-up and stretch-out system which not only destroys their health but the last vestige of human happiness, and must do their work at the master's bidding and under the threat of the loss of their jobs in the event they complain, and under the threat of being blackjacked in the event they strike, as under the law they have a right to do, then surely the power that creates the legal entity should have the right to control it in the exercise of the privileges granted and to lay down certain rules and regulations to govern it in the exercise of its power over the lives and destinies of those whom it employs. Herein lies labor's hope.

Whatever our situation may be, no one can safely contend that any act of any branch of the Government—either the legislative, the executive, or the judicial—justifies the conduct of those who are either openly or secretly violating the laws established for the protection of orderly and organized society. Anyone who argues this is only encouraging violence which, if not checked and controlled, will lead to an expenditure of blood as well as a wealth of treasure.

To contend that nonaction on the part of the Government in failing in all respects to enforce the antitrust laws justifies the debauching of authority is tantamount to saying that the failure to apprehend and to punish all of those who do murder gives a license to the citizen to kill and to plunder as he pleases. This logic would lead to a complete break-down of all law and order.

Law is liberty's noblest champion. The heart that beats with bitterness has no right to mount to the summit of success. While the hour calls for calmness, surely it calls for courage. While respect for law and constituted authority is taught to those in the cradle and around the fireside of our homes, it must find its culmination only in righteous judgments in our temples of justice.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, it was said by one who sat in the convention which framed our Constitution—

> That of those men who have overturned the liberties of republics, the greatest number have begun their career by paying an obsequious court to the people; commencing demagogues and ending tyrants.

From time to time throughout history there have appeared men endowed with mysterious power to fascinate, charm, and beguile certain types of emotional individuals, and by the use of this subtle gift to gain for a time a complete mastery over their minds. Many modern students interested in this phenomena have given careful study to it in an effort to fathom this strange and ofttimes dangerous power which clever, strong-willed, recklessly ambitious characters in times past have exercised over susceptible minds.

It is important to plumb the depths of this phenomena, because many events in history can be explained in no other way. It is important to understand this, for there never was a time when those who love liberty should give more serious consideration to the probable results of mass mind control than now.

Unless citizens can detach themselves from the inflammatory mob-mind spirit long enough to understand what the present movement portends, they eventually will realize how history repeats itself, and how in consequence the liberties of the people are destroyed. Free government cannot long withstand the crushing pressure and demoralizing effect of widespread mob violence. And let us not forget that he who seeks despotic power has generally attained his goal by permitting, and, what is more deplorable, encouraging, mob disorder and disrespect for law. It is only in distressing times that such a man steps forward, appeals to prejudice, arrays class against class, poses as the leader of a new order, captures the imagination of an excited group, and takes complete control of government.

One student who has delved deeply into the phenomenon of the mob mind and the mysterious control which some men exercise over it states that—

> To know the art of impressing the imagination of crowds is to know at the same time the art of governing them.

The man who would become the master of the mob mind, bend it to his purpose and then enslave it, does not appeal to reason; instead he appeals to the passions, the prejudices, and the imagination of those whom he would control. It is by dethroning reason that he gains dominion over the incited mob spirit and then works his will upon it.

If this strange power over mental emotionalism were something new in the annals of history, or so remote and isolated as to have little bearing upon present-day conditions, it might be dismissed as of no particular importance, but such is not the case. Within a very short time we have seen the devastating trends and ultimate force of this kind of personal power, supplemented by the arsenals of modern propaganda, overthrow one government after another, and in every such case constitutional government has been replaced by one-man rule.

And I may add that in every such instance there has followed persecution, intolerance, violence, and loss of individual liberty. The most striking and deplorable feature of gaining emotional control by appealing to the hatreds and passions is that it tends to reduce the intelligence of the intellectual persons, when part of a mob, to the level of the weakest and lowest mentality of the mob. Witness the followers of Robespierre applauding at public executions.

Some of you may feel that it is safe to ignore the gathering storm now plainly visible on the horizon, but remember that this is the very danger George Washington cautioned his countrymen to heed. Washington did not ignore the danger signals of his day, for upon his retirement he issued this fatherly admonition:

> The alternate domination of one faction over another, sharpened by the spirit of revenge, natural to party dissensions, which in different ages and countries has perpetrated the most horrid enormities, is itself a frightful despotism. But this leads at length to a more formal and permanent despotism. The disorders and miseries which result, gradually incline the minds of men to seek security and repose in the absolute power of an individual; and sooner or later the chief of some prevailing faction more able or more fortunate than his competitors turns his disposition to the purposes of his own elevation on the ruins of public liberty.

I do not wish to convey the impression that the United States is at this moment ready for a ruthless Robespierre. I am, however, convinced that we have been placed on a road which, if we follow it to its end, will lead to violence, destruction, bloodshed, and death.

The pattern that is being fashioned here is the very same pattern which was used in France in an earlier day, and in many countries of the Old World at much later dates. I do not for a minute think the President of the United States is himself fashioning a pattern of violence, but I am gravely concerned over the intentions of some of his followers who are now attempting to use the President to prepare the way for a violent change in our constitutional government. Those forces are at work; they are sowing the seed. The present times, superheated as they are with emotionalism, require from every citizen a firm resistence to the appeals made to prejudice and class hatred. The deplorable consequences that will otherwise follow should cause minority groups, racial and religious, to pause and think. Every minority group is now protected by the Constitution and the courts, but let these legal barriers to oppression be destroyed, then what? The answer to this question is being recorded day by day in other lands.

It would seem that two oceans ought to insulate against the madness that afflicts some foreign countries, but the insulation is futile unless our leadership within is sane and sound. The example of chaos caused abroad by reckless leaders who have destroyed individual liberty to gain power ought to deter men from pursuing a similar course here. We should view with distrust any man who seeks power by ignoring the constitutional restraints placed upon him by a free people.

It is obvious to all of us that President Roosevelt enjoys a measure of personal prestige comparable to that of any political leader in the old world. Clothed with a prestige which the name and fame of a predecessor has bequeathed to him, possessed of a personal charm that disarms suspicion, and endowed with unlimited faith in his own infallibility, he takes his place among those unique personalities who appeal to the imagination and the emotional elements of the Nation.

To a man fired with ambition for unlimited political power, these weapons for procuring it are not neglected. We have already seen the President play upon the passions with the skill and effect of a "master." It is by the use of a mixture of forceful, clever, and artful methods which confound the thoughtful and beguile the thoughtless that he has already obtained powers that many a monarchial ruler of several generations ago would have envied.

He has gained that power in the name of emergency, and, praiseworthy as the heralded objectives of his program for "a more abundant life" are, his methods have worked to perpetuate and aggravate that emergency. In the name of this emergency he now asks for additional extraordinary powers—more power—after having enjoyed and wielded unprecedented power for 4 years.

Turning again to the Farewell Address, we hear Washington giving this firm but fatherly admonition:

> The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism.
> A just estimate of that love of power, and the proneness to abuse it which predominates in the human heart, is sufficient to satisfy us of the truth of this position.

Already the American citizens have seen two departments, the executive and the legislative, consolidated into one. It is the executive department that now drafts legislation, controls the purse strings, and allocates funds. To the credit of the Supreme Court, the attempt to also control and dominate the citizens and to rule by bureaucratic decrees instead of by laws enacted by the Congress, was defeated. The vendor of the little brown hen, the pants presser, the baker, the little producer of electrical supplies and hosts of other American citizens found their only refuge from persecution in the people's court, the Supreme Court of the United States.

Now the issue before the American people is whether the third and last department of the Government, the judiciary, shall be "stacked" to make it the tool of the Executive.

The proposal has been made, the issue is joined. When the President sent his message to Congress asking power to appoint six more Supreme Court Justices, the people, including thousands who loyally supported him last year, were amazed, shocked, and grieved.

Amazed, shocked, and grieved as they were then, I venture the statement that they will be equally amazed, shocked, and grieved when they learn the full import of the President's plan to reorganize the administrative departments of the Government. The bill is now locked in the fastness of executive session and will not become public until the committee reports it out. The first reorganization bill sent down from the White House was incredible in its challenge to legislative authority. So incredible that it was soon withdrawn and a second bill, less obvious in its intent, substituted.

I see real danger to our democratic form of government in that one bill alone, but when that bill is coupled with the bill to enlarge the Supreme Court—and they should be coupled—then the danger becomes terrifyingly imminent.

It has been very properly said that "we do not want a dictator in this country, not even a good one." It is alarming indeed to contemplate vesting the enormous powers sought by these two reorganization bills in the hands of the President, where they will remain for the use of Presidents yet unknown.

The individual who plays a game in which his life, liberty, and property are the stakes, and his opponent deals the cards out of a stacked deck, need not expect to win.

I ask every American citizen who believes in fair play to recall the case of Hon. William Humphrey. Here was a distinguished man with spotless reputation and character serving as a Federal Trade Commissioner, and as such he was a quasi-judicial officer. His term of office would not expire until September 1938. What did the President attempt to do this public servant, and for what purpose? I do not need to answer that question. I shall let the President tell you in his own words in a letter written to Judge Humphrey on August 31, 1933. Here is what the President said in that letter:

> You will, I know, realize that I do not feel that your mind and my mind go along together on either policies or the administering of the Federal Trade Commission, and I think it best for the people of this country that I should have full confidence.

What happened? Judge William Humphrey, as an upright man with an unimpeachable record, could not forfeit his honor by prostituting his independence and honest judgment to the wishes of the President.

It was his sworn duty to hear and decide cases on their merits. He declined to resign. Then what did the President do? Listen to the President's own words addressed to Judge Humphrey:

> Effective as of this date you are hereby removed from office as Commissioner of the Federal Trade Commission.

Judge Humphrey died, but his case was taken to the Supreme Court and by its unanimous decision, the name of this honest man was vindicated.

The President's own words and actions conclusively indicate what he expects from the men whom he hopes to appoint to the Supreme Court. His proposal, if adopted, is equivalent to abolishing the Supreme Court, and vesting the judicial power in him.

But what do the sponsors say is their real purpose in wishing to enlarge the Supreme Court with men whose minds will go along with that of the Chief Executive? They insist that under this arrangement acts of Congress will not be declared unconstitutional by the Court.

I ask every American this question: Do you want to put your personal liberties in the hands of Congress and in your State legislature?

To those who think this is a wise thing to do, I call attention to the fact that 10 times since the year 1867 Congress, or one of its branches, has violated the provisions of the Bill of Rights. It has tried to authorize illegal searches and seizures of private papers. It has tried to authorize criminal prosecution of a man after compelling him to testify before a grand jury. It has attempted to take property for public use without due and full compensation. It has attempted to authorize imprisonment of persons at hard labor without an indictment by a grand jury. It has tried to deprive the defendant in a criminal prosecution of his right to be confronted with the witnesses against him. It has attempted to allow an appeal by the Government in a criminal trial after the accused had been found not guilty by a jury. It has attempted to make a crime out of an act which was not a crime when committed. It has attempted to imprison a man without a jury trial for publishing a letter containing matter alleged to be defamatory of the House of Representatives. Three times it has enacted statutes violating the constitutional provision against bills of attainder. The only power that stood between the citizens and these tyrannical acts of Congress was the Supreme Court of the United States.

I cannot believe that in this period of world-wide dizziness the citizens of this Nation wish to destroy the only department of government which can protect them from mob violence and encroachment. I do not believe that the average citizen desires to trust his most cherished liberties to either an Executive, who demands arbitrary power to rule, or to a Congress under the absolute domination and control of such an Executive.

I turn now to a consideration of what the framers of the Federal Constitution had in mind when they placed restraints upon those whom they felt obliged to trust with power. It is impossible to read the Constitution without coming to the conclusion that their main desire was to formulate a plan of government so organized as to make liberty secure, and to make difficult, if not impossible, the despotism of faction or emotion.

Why was this one of their main objectives? They had seen class warfare fanned and fostered in other nations until the consuming flames of passion had destroyed every vestige of justice, charity, mercy, philanthropy, and religious toleration. They knew that disorders of this character had brought to other nations the black night of lawlessness, violence, and ruin.

To be more specific, they knew of governments where one-man power had tolerated and, worse still, encouraged hanging, drowning, and burning of men and women for entertaining religious beliefs and political doctrines that did not conform to the opinion of the man who ruled.

They had before them object lessons in America to warn them of the danger of vesting too much power in those who govern. Had they not seen, during a period of 7 years prior to the signing of the Federal Constitution, the legislatures of four States deprive their citizens of the right to jury trials? They had seen one State impair the freedom of the press by confiscatory taxation. They had witnessed all this and more.

They had seen the State legislatures of several States pass bills of attainder, sentencing men to death and banishment without a criminal trial by jury.

With these examples of tyranny and oppression and numerous others before them, they consecrated their talents to the task of preventing by constitutional restraints those who were to be entrusted with power from encroaching upon the liberties of the people. This they did with such consummate skill that for almost a century and a half the rights of the people have been preserved, protected, and defended from Executive and legislative tyranny.

During all this time, whenever an attempt has been made to encroach upon the liberties of the citizen, the Supreme Court of the United States, recognized by every civilized nation as the greatest judicial tribunal in the world, has come to his defense and sustained his rights.

In concluding, I want to leave one thought with you. I have mentioned but a few, a very few of the cases in which the Supreme Court has upheld the rights of the individual against legislative encroachment. The Supreme Court reports are filled with similar cases—cases where Congress and State legislatures sought to take away rights secured to the individual by the Constitution. Why has the Supreme Court been called upon so many times to protect these rights? It is because legislative bodies, spurred sometimes by racial and religious hysteria, have attempted to take away these rights from the people. And the fact that so many attempts have been made in the past is sufficient proof that many similar attempts will be made in the future. [Applause.]

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. RAMSAY].

Mr. RAMSAY. Mr. Chairman, I want to discuss for a short time three phases of a speech delivered sometime ago before this House by my friend and colleague from Florida [Mr. WILCOX]. The gentleman from Florida said, among other things, that—

> The Supreme Court has established its own economic views as the yardstick by which the constitutionality of acts of Congress have been measured.

Will the gentleman contend that this action of the Court is constitutional? If not, does the gentleman desire to continue these same men in their capacity as Judges, to force upon the American people economic views that have been overwhelmingly repudiated by the American people in the last three national elections?

I know not what the gentleman proposes to do to curb this unlawful and unconstitutional power. But, so far as I am concerned, I am willing to enact any law or measure that is constitutional under the organic law of our land to restore to the representatives of the people the right to function and enact into law the economic theories of government believed in by the people who elected me to Congress to serve as their Representative.

Secondly, the gentleman declared:

If we should accept the President's policy and adopt it into law, then future administrations, which may be headed by a Communist, Fascist, or dictator, will be authorized to follow the precedent established.

Are we now to be instructed that Communists, dictators, and Fascists follow precedents? We know, by the assumption of power by the courts to supervise legislation and dictate its course, that the courts have become, not a coordinate branch of the Government under the Constitution but have created themselves the supreme and absolute power in our land without either check or balance.

Again, the gentleman exclaims, "Remove the doubt by adopting amendments to the Constitution." This is the challenge of every member of the opposition party and every leader of the vested interests, who hail the Court as "blessed" every time it nullifies any forward-looking act of Congress. This is the challenge of every foe of the New Deal.

And why is this challenge so blithely made by the opposition, when they well know the Constitution now, without amendment, provides ample authorization to the legislative body to check and curb this arbitrary power of the courts, first, in the manner now proposed by the President, and, secondly, in making exceptions and reservations to the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court.

Of course, the opposition to the President oppose action along these two lines, well knowing that they cannot defeat either and by either course the Court would be checked and silenced in proclaiming their economic views and would permit the President and his administration to carry out their campaign promises to the people and bring relief to a long-suffering Nation. Why submit this question to a constitutional amendment when the Constitution already points the way?

Of course, the only answer is delay and the almost certain knowledge of the opposition that they could bring certain defeat to this administration by the submission of such amendment by the necessary delay and time consumed for its submission.

Thirteen years ago the child-labor amendment was submitted to the States. It yet remains unratified. Seventeen years expired before the income-tax amendment could be ratified.

The opposition party are solidly massed against any act or amendment that would curtail the powers of the Supreme Court to set aside acts of Congress, because the Supreme Court has decided on acts of Congress exactly as the opposition party voted on these acts.

In other words, the Court issue is a party issue, and no constitutional amendment can be adopted in this country, if the amendment becomes a party issue. This the opposition to the President well know; hence the constant challenge of amendment.

Again, they well know that 12 of our States contain only 5 percent of the people of this country, and under the circumstances they well know they are playing with a stacked deck in their favor, at a ratio of better than 20 to 1.

The gentleman says, "During the past 150 years Congress at one time or another has enacted laws which violated every one of the first 10 amendments to the Constitution and that the untrammeled judiciary stood between the people and their rights."

I do not charge the gentleman with lack of knowledge of this subject, but the records of the Supreme Court show that amendments nos. 1, 2, 3, 8, 9, and 10 have never been passed upon by this Court relative to an act of Congress. That amendments 4, 5, 6, and 7 have come before the Court upon the following subjects:

The fourth amendment to the Constitution provides—

That the people shall be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures.

Upon this amendment there has been one decision of the Supreme Court declaring an act of Congress void. The act required that a party to suit, on motion of Government attorney, could be required to produce in court private papers where allegations of fraud were charged against custom duties. Court held this unconstitutional because it was criminal process. Boyd against United States, One Hundred and Sixteenth United States Reports, page 616.

The fifth amendment to the Constitution provides—

That no person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, nor be subjected for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb, nor be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, nor shall private property be taken for a public use without compensation.

Upon this amendment eight cases have been declared unconstitutional or void, as follows:

Fifth amendment (eight cases).

First case: Law provided that in condemnation proceedings, franchise accruing from the collection of tolls should not be considered in fixing compensation for land taken. Held unconstitutional under fifth amendment (Mon. Navigation Co. v. ——, 148 U. S. 312).

Second case: Law made it a criminal offense for carrier engaged in interstate commerce to discharge employee for becoming member of labor union. Held void because of fifth amendment (Adair v. United States, 208 U. S. 161).

Third case: Law undertook to tax land held by Indians, held by them under patents that exempted land from tax. Held void because of fifth amendment (Choate v. Trapp, 224 U. S. 665).

Fourth case: Provided that upon evidence of illegal sale or manufacture of liquor, a tax should be assessed and collected against the person in double the amount of tax. Held void because of fifth amendment (Lipke v. Lederer, 259 U. S. 557).

Fifth case: Law provided minimum-wage law for women occupied in District of Columbia. Held void because of fifth amendment (Adkins v. Children's Hospital, 261 U. S. 525).

Sixth case: Law authorized tax on estates transferred before passage of law. Held void as to estates that were to be conveyed after death as a violation of fifth amendment (Nicholas v. Coolidge, 274 U. S. 531). Also case similar in Untmeyer v. Anderson (276 U. S. 440). Held decided by Nicholas against Coolidge, above.

Seventh case: Another gift tax case, similar to Cohen case. Held void. Violation of fifth amendment (A. B. Small v. American Sugar Refining Co., 267 U. S. 233).

Eighth case: Law provided first for a summary hearing before judge or commissioner of Chinese persons regarded unlawfully within the United States for their deportation if found guilty, and secondly imprisonment at hard labor for a period of 1 year and then deportation thereafter. Held acts were void, because of the fifth and sixth amendments (Wong Wing v. United States, 163 U. S. 228).

The sixth amendment to the Constitution provides—

That in all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right of a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury.

Upon this amendment, there has been one decision of the Supreme Court, as follows:

During the World War, there was a law passed attaching penalty for any person who made an unjust and unreasonable charge for necessities of life. Held void because of sixth amendment, on the ground that persons accused of crime shall be adequately informed of charge (United States v. Cohen Grocery Co., 226 U. S. 81).

Under the fifth and sixth amendments, the following cases were held void:

First case: Law provided that a conviction for embezzlement from the United States should be considered conclusive evidence that the property was stolen from the United States. Held void as against fifth and sixth amendments (Kirby v. United States, 174 U. S. 47).

Second case: Law provided that in trials for misdemeanors six jurors should serve in cases tried in Alaska. Held void because of the fifth and sixth amendments (Rasmussen v. United States, 197 U. S. 516).

The seventh amendment to the Constitution provides:

> That in suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed $20, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved; and no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise reexamined in any court of the United States than according to the rules of the common law.

Upon this amendment there has been one decision of the Supreme Court declaring an act of Congress void.

The act provided that in habeas corpus process the case could be removed from the State court to the Federal court, and further provided for new trial. Court held same null because it would place defendant in jeopardy because it required new trial (The Justices v. Murray, 9 Wall. 274).

Some of the decisions were five to four, to which the gentleman himself objects, and I believe the first thought of the average lawyer and layman will be that the Court was wrong in most of them; at least everyone must be impressed with the fact that not one of these cases show that Congress was attempting to take away from the people any liberty or freedom, as charged by the gentleman, but, on the contrary, was trying to make law and order more effective and to protect the interest of the general public.

I believe in the Constitution of the United States. I believe in it so much that I believe the power to enact legislation should be taken from the courts and restored to Congress.

I also believe that the Supreme Court of the United States ought to be deprived of the power to violate the Constitution by destroying acts of Congress.

Under the Constitution of the United States Congress represents the people and must answer to them every 2 years. To say that Congress cannot be trusted to protect and respect the organic laws of the land is, in effect, to say that our form of government is a failure and that the people themselves cannot be trusted to protect and preserve their own Government.

If I could believe that the members of the Court could rise above politics and exercise this great and absolute power in a clear and judicial manner, then I would say, "Amen, let the Court alone", and I would trust implicitly. But I know the Court consists of mere men, and no mere man should be given this power without check or restraint.

Like Jefferson, I believe the people, and the people alone, should be the final arbiter. If this power should be invested in acts of Congress, the people can finally decide, as they have a check in the elections every 2 years. But in a court occupying a life tenure, there is no check or balance, and the Court (in the words of one of its members) "is only checked by their own restraint."

The Court, by its recent ruthless setting aside of acts of Congress has proven to the people that we cannot rely on the Court to restrain itself whenever the members of the Court have an opportunity to assert their economic views.

Every great Judge of the Court, including Mr. Taft, bears me out in this view. Also every great President, including Jefferson, Jackson, Lincoln, and Theodore Roosevelt. Can any reasonable man question the sanity or patriotism of these great Americans?

Personally, I believe the powers granted to the Congress of the United States by the Constitution are to be taken as broadly granted, and as carrying with them the authority to pass those acts which may be reasonably necessary to carry them into full execution. Further, that the Supreme Court does not, and should not, have the right to prevent Congress from fully carrying out its constitutional functions.

I also believe the power to regulate interstate commerce includes the power to control things that are not in themselves interstate commerce, if such things affect such commerce. This the Court once fully recognized during other administrations (see especially Northern Securities Co. v. United States, 193 U. S. 196), and other cases I could cite. But the Court, now composed of men with different economic views, in the Guffey Coal case hold otherwise. Therefore, I am driven to the conclusion that the Court, upon these great questions of national policy, are not governed by the law or the Constitution.

What does my friend propose as a remedy—delay and more delay?

Mr. Chairman, even the gentlewoman from Massachusetts has offered a remedy. She would deny the right of the Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain to sit upon the Supreme Court. But my friend from Florida would await the time the members of this Court become conscious of their sin and decide to lead a new and better life.

What is the matter with the President's plan? Is it unconstitutional? No. Does it take away any of the rights, prerogatives, and duties of the Court? No. What, then, is the matter with it? If the President's plan is adopted into law, the chances are the Court would deny itself the power to dictate the kind and character of legislation Congress can adopt, and would refuse to lend itself to partisan decision; refuse to confine all legislation of Congress to the economic theories of the Mark Hanna period.

The President's plan will remove from the paths of progress a rock that stands in its way, like the Rock of Gibraltar to the gateway of the Mediterranean. It will make it possible for Congress to remove forever from the marts of trade and industry child labor, to aid the unemployed, conserve the Nation's lands, waterways, and resources, and be assured of the right to aid the aged and helpless.

Of course, the courts at the present time can impede the passage of laws on these subjects, but they will be acted upon whenever public opinion is sufficiently strong enough to enforce them. "Time marches on!" A new day dawns, which has brought new problems that must be solved. Kings, courts, and governments pass away whenever they refuse to meet the problems of their times. The world and its people cannot remain static. Onward and forward are the constant marching orders of our civilization. [Applause.]

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. PHILLIPS].

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the House to a situation affecting the safety of the traveling public on interstate motor busses. All of us read in the daily newspapers a few days ago of a terrible accident which befell those traveling in an interstate bus. It so happened that I received a letter from Mr. John L. Rogers, Director of the Bureau of Motor Carriers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, on this subject. This letter arrived in my office either the day when the terrible accident was reported or the day after—at the moment I forget which. With the permission of the Committee I shall read a one-paragraph letter which I wrote Mr. Rogers and his reply to me.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. Chairman, this is my letter to Mr. Rogers:

MARCH 18, 1937.

Mr. JOHN L. ROGERS,
Director, Department of Motor Carriers,
Interstate Commerce Commission, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. ROGERS: I would appreciate it if you would inform me as to what requirements are made of interstate bus transportation companies as regards their providing for emergency safety doors on their busses, i. e., how many doors are required, the capacity of these doors as means of egress for passengers in case of emergency, position of the releases which open them, and other pertinent details.

Thanking you in advance, I am,
Very sincerely,

ALFRED N. PHILLIPS, JR.

Here is the reply to my letter:

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION,
BUREAU OF MOTOR CARRIERS,
Washington, March 23, 1937.

Hon. ALFRED N. PHILLIPS, Jr.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: This will acknowledge receipt of your letter of March 18, inquiring as to the requirements of interstate busses with regard to emergency safety doors.

The regulations recently issued by this Commission, a copy of which is enclosed herewith for your information, do not mention safety doors or their location. This matter is a part of the whole subject of cab and body design, which our limited facilities have not yet permitted us to study in any detail. We well realize its importance, however, and are keeping it in mind for early attention. A perusal of the initial regulations enclosed will show clearly, I trust, our approach to the complex problem of motor-vehicle safety, and our concentration at the outset upon those basic items on which we have felt we could make an immediate and beneficial contribution to the great majority of the diverse operations under our jurisdiction.

We shall be glad to receive your comments upon our initial regulations and upon any other matters which you desire to call to our attention, and we appreciate greatly your interest in our work.

Very truly yours,

JOHN L. ROGERS, Director.

In my office I have the regulations which the gentleman enclosed. They are contained in a booklet about half an inch thick, and may I honestly say that if a 15- or 16-year-old child could not compile the regulations which that booklet contains, then I think that child ought to have its sanity examined into. The regulations are absolutely elementary in character. They deal with proper examination of bus drivers, brakes, and say that drivers shall not drive busses in dangerous conditions of ice, and so on. Nothing is said about safety doors. There is no regulation about protecting people from terrible accidents such as occurred recently, or the accident which occurred 2 months ago when a bus went off the Tamiami Trail in Florida and so many passengers on the bus were drowned.

Mr. Chairman, I have prepared a bill upon this subject. I do not say it is perfect. I respectfully solicit the thought and attention of Members of the House on this subject so that this bill may be passed or amended and passed, or so that some bill may be introduced and passed covering this matter. Briefly, the bill in one paragraph requires interstate busses after July 1, 1937, to have at least four doors, two on each side, with releases easy to get at and easy to operate, so that the passengers in interstate busses, when such busses are completely loaded, can obtain egress in 60 seconds through any two doors, after the doors are opened.

The bill is H. R. 5936, and has been referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. SCOTT].

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I suppose if it were possible for me to change the opinion of every Member in the House right now it would not make much difference. It would not affect any legislation; yet I do want to take issue—and I dislike to do it—with some remarks that were made and general conclusions drawn by the gentleman from North Carolina a little while ago. I want to speak on the opposite side of this sit-down strike situation.

Mr. Chairman, the present barrage against sit-down strikes is a barrage against trade-unionism itself and against the right of collective bargaining. The resolution offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] and the remarks he and other gentlemen have made on the floor of this House are calculated not only to discredit the tactic of the sit-down strike but to discredit the entire labor movement. It is no accident that the main editorial support for the resolution calling for an investigation of sit-down strikes is to be found in the Hearst press.

This resolution prejudges the sit-down strike. Its author has also introduced a bill outlawing the sit-down. The attitude and animus of the author, as clearly expressed on the floor, and the very wording of the resolution indicate that it will not be used to determine through an impartial finding of facts the causes and conditions which lead up to and compel the sit-down. It will be used by the reactionaries for the purpose of conducting a fishing expedition into union affairs. It will be used in an attempt to bring into disrepute the entire labor movement, and especially the Committee for Industrial Organization, one of the most progressive forces in the country, which is providing the opportunity to join unions to thousands and thousands of workers who have never before had the benefits of organization and collective bargaining. This Dies resolution will be used by Hearst in his campaign against the trade-unions and the democratic rights of the people.

THE SIT-DOWN IS SUCCESSFUL

What is troubling the opponents of the sit-down strike is not the so-called technical violation of the laws of trespass. These gentlemen and the forces they represent are worried mostly by the effectiveness of the sit-down. For the sit-down is successful. It is winning for workers what they have not had before, in spite of the fact that it is guaranteed to them by law. It is winning for workers what the companies, in utter disregard for the law, have until now succeeded in denying them. It is winning for them the right to join unions for their mutual aid and protection and to bargain collectively with respect to the terms and conditions of their employment. The New Republic, in its issue of March 31, states the situation accurately. It says:

The outcry against the sit-down comes, 95 percent of the time, from those who have never in the past supported collective bargaining. They demand that labor should give up this effective weapon, but they have no alternative to propose. What they really want is the open shop; what they really object to is the fact that the sit-down is singularly effective.

Mr. Chairman, every weapon which labor has employed to better its conditions has been held at its inception to be illegal. Every new method of labor has been denominated lawless by the reactionaries. Thus, in Anglo-American law the boycott was once illegal; before that, peaceful picketing was considered lawless; before that, to threaten or to engage in a strike was a criminal act; before that, it was considered conspiracy for workmen to combine to raise wages; and until a little over a hundred years ago, it was illegal for a worker, acting singly, even to demand higher wages. Today these acts are legal. Their legality has been recognized by the courts and by the Congress in the Norris-LaGuardia Anti-Injunction Act and in the National Labor Relations Act. Only yesterday, in upholding the Railway Labor Act, the Supreme Court again recognized the fundamental right of workmen to organize and bargain collectively.

And shortly the legality of this new and most effective weapon, the sit-down strike, will be no longer open to question. Already Prof. Leon Green, dean of the Northwestern Law School, has indicated his belief that the sit-down is legal; already Prof. James M. Landis, next year's dean of the Harvard Law School, has spoken of "new concepts and mechanisms to meet the needs out of which this type of economic pressure has been born."

THESE MEN ARE NOT TRESPASSERS

The arguments which the lawyers advance to support the legality of the sit-down strike are peculiarly convincing to those of us who are not lawyers. For we laymen see the picture very clearly. We see the workers who have spent their lives coming daily to the plants to produce the goods which will yield to the employer a profit. We see them demanding the right to bargain collectively, to be heard through representatives of their own choosing on questions affecting hours and wages and conditions of work, which is their right according to law. We see the employers disregarding that right, refusing to recognize their unions, discriminating against them for union activity, forming company unions to disrupt their own organizations, hiring spies to enter their ranks and provocateurs to bring them into disrepute. We see the employers willfully violating the law. And we see the workers enforcing their rights in the only way that is left to them which is effective—by remaining peacefully and without damage to physical property at their places of work until the employer shall agree to negotiate with them and recognize their rights to organize and bargain collectively. We laymen are unwilling to call such persons lawbreakers.

But the layman realizes also that to limit the debate solely to the legal issue—to the question of whether or not there is a technical violation of the laws of trespass—is to evade and disregard the main issue: How are the workers to secure their rights? How are the employers to be made to abide by the law of the land? How are we to deal with the fact that from 1934 to 1936 General Motors paid $839,764 to Pinkerton spies? Mr. Chairman, the sit-down strike which deserves the most condemnation is the sit-down strike of some unscrupulous employers against the law of the land.

If the workers engage in a walk-out strike, they are faced with organized strikebreaking and provocation. They are faced with the armed thugs of the company who perpetrate all manner of violence upon them. They are faced with discrimination and the blacklist in case their strike should be broken by these lawless methods. By the sit-down these worst abuses of the company are prevented or diminished. Violence is less likely to occur. An amicable settlement is hastened, and each side suffers less on account of the dispute.

EMPLOYERS BEAR RESPONSIBILITY

Mr. Chairman, I say the employers bear the responsibility for the present wave of sit-down strikes. The employers, because of their flagrant and willful denial of the basic rights of their workmen, have rendered any other course of action by their workmen ineffective. The employers can stop sit-down strikes. They can stop them not by sending the militia or their private gunmen to take the lives of workmen who are defending their jobs and their livelihood. They can stop them by the simple agreement to enter into collective bargaining with their workmen through representatives of the workmen's own choosing, as is required by law.

The sit-down is not illegal. Rather it is the workers' answer to the illegal activities of the employers. [Applause.]

I yield back the balance of my time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. VOORHIS].

Mr. VOORHIS. Mr. Chairman, I suppose it would be too obvious to require a statement from me to say that the time in which we live is one of great difficulty.

It is not my purpose this afternoon to speak at length about the problem of labor unrest which we have already heard about from two or three speakers this afternoon. But I would like, if I may, to point out briefly two or three ideas that seem to me to be fundamental, and which it is most important for us to bear in mind as we attempt, dispassionately and wisely, to approach this problem.

The first of those ideas is that there comes a time in history when among every free people, among every people who are eager to satisfy the basic desires of humanity, changes in the old way of doing things, in the old relationship of people, inevitably must take place. I believe that the age in which we live is one in which the birth of a new relationship between the man who works for wages and the employer for whom he works is inevitable. I believe the time has come in our America when we must recognize, if we recognize anything, that the right of the man who works for wages to organization and to collective bargaining, his right to that feeling of standing on an even basis with the man for whom he works, has come as a thing that must be recognized as here to stay.

The second idea I want to present is this: That in industries where that right has been unquestionably recognized for a long period, there has not occurred a condition of labor strikes or stoppage of industry. I give you as an example the railway industry, where the right of organization and collective bargaining has been in effect a long time. I submit that in that industry there has not been a serious stoppage for many years. Why? Probably because the basic right of the worker in that industry is taken for granted.

Under those circumstances it becomes the part of wisdom among those who are responsible for governmental policy to see to it that this basic justice to the worker is guaranteed by governmental action. If so, then we will have very largely removed the cause of industrial conflict which lies in certain injustices in social relationship. The Congress did take that action in the passage of the National Labor Relations Act. That act, however, due to injunctions and due to decisions on the part of courts that manufacturing is a local matter and therefore not fit for Federal legislation, is in many cases virtually inoperative. Because of that fact we find that the remedy which the Congress itself has provided, the remedy dealing with the basic cause of industrial unrest, because it gives to the worker his basic right, has been prostrated. I leave you with these remarks, and ask you what the Congress of the United States is going to do. But I merely suggest that these facts cannot but fortify the position of those who in this day are insisting that something be done to assert the right of the Congress of the United States to have the laws which it passes become effective. At present we are in the rather ridiculous position of being called upon to take some action with regard to strikes, when the action already taken by this body is itself rendered of no effect by the action of the judicial branch of Government. For my part I hope Congress will stick to its guns, will insist upon its National Labor Relations Act, and will provide thus a guaranty of the right of collective bargaining and the provision of orderly mediation of labor disputes.

But if it is our job, then with our responsibility must go corresponding power; and, as I say, this implies constructive action in dealing with the problem of the nullification of acts of Congress by the courts.

I imagine that I share with many other Members of this House a feeling of admiration for the very able address that was delivered this morning by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM]. It is difficult for some of us, perhaps, to see just how it is going to be possible to cut very much from Government expenditures. Some of us naturally harbor the fear that when we talk about cutting down appropriations we mean cutting down provision of useful public work for the unemployed and money for social security, which things, it seems to many of us, are absolutely essential to be continued, if not expanded; but I suppose that all of us who are conscientious about our jobs will take to heart the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia this morning and understand them as meaning that in the measures that we advocate we necessarily assume responsibility for knowing where the money is coming from in addition to making our appeal for the use of that money for some social or humanitarian purpose.

I believe that there are certain matters in our Nation today, already pointed out to us by the President and others, which deserve serious consideration. One of them is that the basis is laid already for the possibility of inflation, a thing we must provide means to control. The profits of the large corporations are today, perhaps, as great as they have been in almost any period in our history. We still have in many industries a wage that is far too low. We still have 10,000,000 unemployed. We still have 160,000 people about to lose their homes through Government foreclosure. I read a little item in the paper yesterday about how a strike in New England was called off because the workers were granted a minimum wage of only 30 cents per hour.

The question is, of course, "What are we going to do about it?"

CAN WE PROFIT FROM PAST MISTAKES?

I think one pattern of historical facts should be constantly in our minds as we face this problem—this problem of keeping America on an upward path, of preventing another 1929. That pattern of facts is this: The wage scale, the scale of farmers' income, the income of the aged and the unemployed during the 1920's was not high enough in proportion to total production, nor high enough in proportion to profits to prevent the collapse of the home market, the piling up of a great superstructure of consumers' indebtedness in installment buying, and the appearance on the stock shelves of industry of a thing that was erroneously called a surplus.

These facts have a bearing on tax policy, on the present labor situation, on the future program to be adopted with regard to unemployment, and on the whole great question of social security and old-age pensions.

It is about the last of these questions that I wish to speak a few plain words. I venture to say that at least two-thirds of the Members of the House were elected to this body after having repeatedly stated, at the least, that they were in favor of a system of adequate Federal old-age pensions. Some Members were definitely endorsed by one or another of the national old-age pension movements. Others like myself were, no doubt, opposed quite bitterly by some of these national organizations, but nevertheless declared themselves as believing a workable national system of direct pensions should be established, and thus did gain the support of many pension-minded people and were elected partly by their votes.

The question now arises, What are we going to do about it? Are we going to breathe a sigh of relief and say that we are thankful that the organized pension movement is no longer as strong as it used to be? Or are we going to take the position that we have a pledge to fulfill and that, regardless of pressure or lack of it, we will sincerely carry out that pledge to the best of our ability?

All of us know that this old-age pension question is nowhere near as simple as it sounds. We know that money to pay the pension will have to come from somewhere. We know that in the end it will come out of the purchasing power of the rest of the population, or certain segments of it. We know that if our production is large and the distribution of buying power fair and equitable, the raising of money for the pensions can be accomplished without working undue hardship. We know that the size of the pension must, therefore, depend on the production of wealth in the Nation and that to fix an arbitrary figure is dangerous.

ESTABLISH PRINCIPLE OF FEDERAL PENSIONS

We know, therefore, that if we are to make good on our statements in the campaign regarding old-age pensions we have three things to do: First, to do everything we can to stimulate production; second, to continue to develop a tax system which will tend to give the Nation a decent distribution of buying power, and which will be fair and which will not defeat our whole purpose by putting a crushing load on those least able to bear it; third, to get passed a piece of legislation which will at least establish the principle of general Federal old-age pensions, paid direct by the Federal Government and not second-hand through State and county charity organizations.

There have been, I believe, some 20 or 25 old-age pension measures introduced into the House. There is the McGroarty bill, the General Welfare Act, and a number of bills aiming to amend the Social Security Act.

My own position is that, while I have my own opinion, and while I would prefer a certain type of legislation, I stand ready to cooperate fully with every Member of this House who has declared himself for old-age pensions, to the end that all such Members may unite their strength and accomplish something.

I believe a real service has been performed by those, both in this body and out of it, who have focused the attention of the Nation on the appalling problem of old-age insecurity.

But the present situation is most unfair to millions of old folks who have had their hopes raised so high, and who still today are of the opinion that the particular measure upon which they have pinned their hopes can be passed. I think the truth should be told.

HOW WE CAN'T AND HOW WE CAN PASS A PENSION LAW

Every one of us knows, and the old folks of the Nation are entitled to know, that there is not enough strength behind any one of the various old-age pension bills which have been introduced to enact that measure into law. I believe, however, that there is enough strength and enough intelligence here so that if differences were buried, and if some hard thinking were done, it would be possible to pass a workable measure by the united effort of all who are committed in one way or another to this worthy cause. The hard thinking I speak of must, of course, be applied not merely to the question of payments but also to the matter of revenue to make the payments possible.

I hope we can get down to cases. I hope we can put practical results first and propaganda second. Campaign promises and statements should be sacred things to us. And I believe the time has come to put it down in black and white that to insist at this time on any pet plan that may be in your mind or mine is to defeat the cause of old-age security, and to substitute political expediency for the statesmanship we owe to those who sent us here. I feel sure that no Member of the House wants to do this. Everyone recognizes that the Social Security Act is a start in the right direction. Everyone recognizes that it is not, in its present form, the final answer to the problem.

Let us unite to establish it as a principle of American government that this, the greatest nation on earth, will not see her aged people condemned to pauperism as their permanent lot in life. Let us do the best we can. Let us then explain fearlessly why it is the best we can do at this time. But let us not hide behind a situation, which now exists, which will enable us to go back home when Congress adjourns and say that we did not do anything because the other fellows would not agree to do it our way. [Applause.]

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SHAFER] such time as he may desire.

GOVERNMENT BY PRINCIPLES OR BY PERSONALITIES—A DISCUSSION OF THE FUNDAMENTAL PROBLEM INVOLVED IN THE PRESIDENT'S PROPOSAL TO TAKE DOMINION OVER THE JUDICIAL DEPARTMENT OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, beneath the avalanche of words, the torrent of theories and argument loosed by President Roosevelt's proposal that he be given power by this Congress to alter the personnel of the Federal judiciary is a fundamental problem upon which this Congress and the citizens of this Nation must make a choice. Upon that choice depends the soundness of the structure of our free Republic, the welfare and the liberties not alone of this generation but, to a vastly greater degree, the future of our democracy and the liberties and the happiness of generations who will follow us.

Stripped of camouflage, subterfuge, and the cloud of controversy that has enveloped the President's demand and reduced to its actual essentials of meaning and purpose, Mr. Roosevelt's proposal is now recognized to be a demand by the Executive for the power to set aside the historic independence of the Federal judiciary as a constitutional department of the Government and, through ability to alter the personnel, particularly that of the Supreme Court, to assure to himself such interpretation of the Constitution as will be in accordance with his policy of experimentation under a new philosophy of government.

That his policy is one of experimentation has too many times been so defined by the President himself to be denied, and I take it that no one now questions that fact. In an address in Baltimore, April 13, 1936, President Roosevelt declared:

> • • • I say to you, do something; and when you have done that something, if it works, do it some more; and if it does not work, do something else.

The Congress and the country should clearly understand and should carefully consider these significant facts: The President's proposal to impair the independence of the Federal judiciary, the unprecedented effort to destroy the confidence of the Nation in the judgment of the Federal courts and in the integrity and impartiality of the Justices are experimental, but they are not temporary devices. If this Congress gives the Chief Executive power over the judiciary personnel, it can be taken from him only by a two-thirds vote of each House of this Congress. The men whom he will appoint, whether two or six, will remain on the Supreme Bench for many years. The damage done to the confidence the country has always had in the Constitution and in the Federal judiciary will not be undone within this generation.

So, then, this proposal, while purely experimental, is not temporary in its nature; and if, as Mr. Roosevelt says, "It doesn't work", a grave, if not fatal, mistake will have been made.

The problem raised by the President's proposal, insofar as its essentials are concerned, is not one of motives but of modes. Regardless of whether or not the President is correct in his theory of an experimental policy of government, altered from time to time to meet emergencies or changing conditions, the fundamental question involved in Mr. Roosevelt's demand for dominion over the personnel of the judiciary remains the same.

Mr. Roosevelt, in his "fireside chat" over the radio on March 9 last, made it clear that he believes the Republic "is under a Constitution, but the Constitution is what the judges say it is." He quoted a Justice of the Court, I believe, in using that phrase, but the President made it clear that such is his conception of our democracy as it stands today. Therefore, it is an inescapable conclusion that the President's purpose in presenting his proposal to take dominion over the judicial personnel is to possess himself of the correlative power to select judges who will say that the Constitution is what he wants them to say it is. If this is not the President's purpose, then his demand for dominion over the judicial personnel becomes pointless and his effort futile, because claims that the courts are not keeping abreast of their work have been shown to be without any real foundation, and his contention that the mere passage of years inexorably operates in every case to incapacitate judges mentally and physically to the point of incompetence has been equally discredited. Indeed, these contentions have been almost wholly abandoned by the President's spokesmen. Fundamentally, the objections of Mr. Roosevelt are not to the age of the Justices who voted to invalidate New Deal legislation. Charles Warren, the eminent historian, in his work, The Supreme Court in United States History, accurately described the Rooseveltian attitude when he said:

> The real grievance felt by the Court's critics is not the number of Justices who joined in setting aside the Federal statutes; it is rather in the fact that the statute was set aside at all.

The essence of this problem the President has presented to the Nation, which should engage the grave and thoughtful consideration of every citizen in and out of this Congress, is:

Shall we depart from a government based upon principle and adopt a government based upon personalities? Shall we depart from a government by organic law and embrace a government by men?

The principle of government embedded in the Constitution is as sound, as unchanging, and as essential to continued liberty under a democracy as is the principle of mathematics to the rules of that science. The Constitution, as the expressed will of the people to impose upon themselves a wise self-restraint, to protect themselves from their own passionate and unwise action in a time of excitement, panic, or inflamed public opinion, is embedded in the consciousness of this Nation. So long—and only so long—as the policies and the laws enacted by the Congress are within the limitations and in accordance with the spirit and the letter of the Constitution will the foundations of this Republic remain unimpaired, and the liberties of its citizens be impregnable against the assaults of organized self-seeking minorities, or the ravages of impatient and vehement majorities.

My thought can be expressed in no better language than to quote that remarkable student of American Government, James Bryce, who wrote more than half a century ago in his American Commonwealth:

> The Supreme Court is the living voice of the Constitution—that is, of the will of the people expressed in the fundamental laws they have enacted. It is, therefore, as someone has said, the conscience of the people, who have resolved to restrain themselves from hasty or unjust action by placing their representatives under the restriction of a permanent law. It is the guaranty of the minority, who, when threatened by the impatient vehemence of a majority, can appeal to this permanent law, finding the interpreter and enforcer thereof in a court set high above the assaults of faction.
> To discharge these momentous functions, the Court must be stable, even as the Constitution is stable. * * * It must resist transitory impulses, and resist them the more firmly the more vehement they are. Entrenched behind impregnable ramparts, it must be able to defy at once the open attacks of the other departments of government and the more dangerous, because impalpable, seductions of popular sentiment.

The moment, Mr. Chairman, that we depart from the sound historic practice of conforming our legislative policies and acts to the unswerving principles of organic law laid down in the Constitution, and adopt the practice of interpreting the Constitution to conform to such policies and acts as an impatient majority or a highly organized and effective minority may regard as necessary under any given circumstances, just that moment we will destroy government by principle and set up government by personalities. If that happens—and I cannot believe that this Nation will permit it to happen—the greatest principle of free government "ever devised by the mind of man" will have been expelled from the Constitution, and that organic law will become an instrument subject to the bias of political and of personal judgments, desires, and motives, and a potential instrument for curtailment of the liberties, rights, and privileges of the minorities, and will inevitably become the means of oppressing all the people of this Nation.

Mr. Roosevelt himself, in a radio address delivered in 1930 during his second term as Governor of New York, defined perfectly the present problem raised by his proposal when he said:

> The doctrine of regulation and legislation by "master minds", in whose judgment and will all the people may gladly and quietly acquiesce, has been too glaringly apparent at Washington during those last 10 years. Were it possible to find "master minds" so unselfish, so willing to decide unhesitatingly against their own personal interests or private prejudices—men almost godlike in their ability to hold the scales of justice with an even hand—such a government might be in the interest of the country; but there are none such on our political horizon, and we cannot expect a complete reversal of all the teachings of history.

No more profound and accurate estimate of the dangers of government by personalities has ever been uttered, or ever will be uttered, than those words of the man who, much to my regret, has turned his back upon those principles and now urges the very doctrine he then condemned.

History is, indeed, strewn with the wreckage of nations whose peoples departed from government by principle and were ruined by government by men.

Once abandon impartial and independent judicial interpretation of the Constitution as the organic law of government, and hand over to any individual or group of individuals, no matter how sincere may be their motives, the government under a constitution to be construed to suit their changing policies and purposes, and you have established rule by oligarchy. That oligarchy will, by the very nature of men, seek more and more power; that oligarchy will, by the very nature of oligarchic government, require more and more power; that oligarchy will, by the very nature of unrestrained power, more and more oppress opposing minorities until, as truly as it is true that the past is the prologue of the present, and history the prophecy of the future, democracy will totally disappear from our American way of life and despotism, oppression, revolution will follow.

Even if it is true that some broadening of the Constitution may be necessary to adapt its limitations to conditions which admittedly the founding fathers could not possibly have foreseen, the prescience of the framers of the Constitution still stands today as one of the spiritual marvels of all history. But grant that some broadening of the Constitution is necessary. There is an orderly way provided in the very organic law itself for that—and that way is by amendment. I have no patience with the contention that the process is too slow. Too many amendments have been proposed and ratified within a year or 18 months, when the people wanted to so amend their organic law, for that argument to carry any weight. Therefore, if any change be needed in the Constitution, let us not abandon the spirit and the principle of that organic law; let us proceed in the orderly constitutional manner to amend it as may be wise and necessary, and retain our government by principle; let us not yield to the seductions and promises of those who would set up over this great Nation a government by men. [Applause.]

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. COFFEE].

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Mr. Chairman, much has been said on this floor concerning the merits and demerits of the sit-down strikes. This afternoon the learned gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COOLEY] gave vent to some utterances in which he reflected upon the legality and the wisdom of the sit-down strikes. In the course of his remarks I saw fit to interrogate him on one point when I asked him whether or not he had signed the petition to discharge the committee from further consideration of the antilynching bill. He replied that he had not. The reason I asked him that question was because I felt that he had spoken so eloquently concerning his reverence for the majesty of the law that he should be consistent by proceeding to advocate the adoption of the antilynching law; for, if he is concerned that the majesty of the law is involved in sit-down strikes, certainly he should be equally concerned in seeing that the members of the colored race be not subjected with impunity to violation of the majesty of the law in his own State.

Members of this House have been eloquent in dilating upon their reverence for the majesty of the law. I do not take a back seat to anyone in my respect for the law, but at a time when we are apotheosizing the supremacy of the law, why not get at the cause of the sit-down strike instead of curbing the results? What is it that provokes the sit-down strikes? What are the economic injustices that bring them about? To this end, Mr. Chairman, I have prepared a few remarks in which I have attempted to show the legal basis for sit-down strikes and in which I have undertaken to suggest and have had the temerity of asserting to this august body that sit-down strikes are legal in contemplation of the law.

Mr. Chairman, during the last 2 weeks the attention of this House has been occupied at length by the question of sit-down strikes. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] has introduced a resolution calling for an investigation of sit-downs by a special committee of this House. The same gentleman has introduced a bill making sit-down strikes violations of the Federal antitrust laws. A number of other gentlemen have variously condemned and attacked sit-down strikes, sit-down strikers, the Committee for Industrial Organization, and the labor movement in general.

The resolution, the bill, and the remarks were predicated upon a single premise, that sit-down strikes are illegal. Mr. Chairman, I rise to challenge that premise. I say that the sit-down strike is a lawful method by which workingmen, in the face of refusal by the employer to abide by the law of the land and respect their rights, seek to protect their rights and improve their conditions. The sit-down is as American as the attempt to throttle the democratic rights of the people is un-American. This is true despite the fulminations of those labor leaders who are now attacking the sit-down strike as an un-American labor tactic. It is surprising, indeed, to note their attack is couched in substantially the same language as that employed by the National Manufacturers Association in a simultaneous denunciation appearing in this week's press.

Before entering upon my argument, I should like briefly to refer to the resolution offered by the gentleman from Texas, which, as I understand, will be heard before the Rules Committee on Wednesday. Mr. Chairman, I am altogether opposed to this resolution and to the spirit with which it was offered. In the first place, the premise of illegality is entirely unfounded and unless this premise is discarded no investigation can be undertaken in the spirit of impartiality, fairness, and justice. In the second place, the assumptions contained in the whereas clauses of the resolution are based on untruths and are slanderous of the American labor movement.

And in the third and most important place, this investigation would provide the means for a virtual "witch hunt" into unions and union affairs and would be used as a weapon for the reactionaries against the labor movement.

Mr. Chairman, I base my contention that the sit-down strike is legal on three fundamental principles which are recognized by our court decisions and statutes as the law of the land:

First. The sit-down strikers are invited onto the premises of the company as employees, they remain employees during the course of the dispute, and they can in no way be considered trespassers.

Second. Employees have a property right in their jobs which the law entitles them to protect by appropriate means.

Third. The action of the sit-down strikers is justified under the law as is any other collective action by employees to better their conditions.

STATEMENT OF FACTS

The legal arguments which I shall present are based upon the following state of facts which are typical of the recent important sit-down strikes. The employer has refused to negotiate with the union regarding terms or conditions of employment. In this, as well as in other activities which interfere with the employees' right of self-organization and collective bargaining, the employer is unlawfully denying the established legal rights of the workingmen. In face of open defiance by employers of the laws establishing these rights of labor to organize and bargain collectively, the employees are obliged to resort to self-help to secure their rights. Strikes of the ordinary kind have been rendered ineffective because of unemployment, strikebreaking, laws against picketing, and violence used against strikers by hired agents of the employers. The sit-down strike has so far proven labor's most effective method of protecting its legal rights and improving its economic condition.

The facts of the typical sit-down are simple. The employees cease to work and peacefully and quietly remain at their places, awaiting the adjustment, through negotiations, of their differences with the employer. They scrupulously care for the physical property of the employer. They are prepared to leave the plant or to resume work the moment the employer proves that he is willing to abide by his legal obligations and to bargain collectively with them.

The lawfulness of the sit-down is proven by the well-established legal doctrines that follow.

ARGUMENT

I. THE STATUS OF THE SIT-DOWN STRIKERS AS EMPLOYEES

The employment relation is not terminated by a strike or by any other incidents of a labor dispute. Sit-down strikers are on the company's premises in the status of employees; their presence there is an incident of their employment relation, and they can in no way be treated as trespassers.

A. The employment relation is not terminated

The employment relation is not terminated by a labor dispute or by an attempted discharge of employees who are participating in the dispute.

It is beyond question that the employment relation is not severed by the existence of a strike, that employees retain their status as such during the existence of a labor dispute. In Michaelson v. U. S. (266 U. S. 42 (1924)), the Supreme Court, reversing the decision of the C. C. A. (291 Fed. 940, 1922), held that workers on strike are employees within the meaning of section 20 of the Clayton Act. See also Duplex Printing Press Co. v. Deering (254 U. S. 443 (1921)). Likewise in Dail-Overland Co. v. Willys-Overland, Inc. (263 Fed. 171), it was held that:

> As long as conditions are such that what is called "settlement" might seem reasonably possible between the company and its late workmen, the latter, it seems, should be considered "employees", within the meaning of that term in the Clayton Act.

See also Matter of Columbian Enameling, etc., Co. and Enameling, etc., Union (1 National Labor Relations Board Decisions 181 (1936)). In Giltner v. Becker (133 Kan. 170 (1931)), the Court held that:

> The petitioner, defendant in the injunction action, having been an employee of the plantiff until 3 months before the issuing of the restraining order, was such as to come within the provisions of the statute.

Which was similar to section 20 of the Clayton Act.

These decisions are in accord with the realities of the situation, for "in common parlance, the words 'employer' and 'employee' are applied to the parties in a strike because neither side contemplates nor desires a permanent abandonment of the relation. Each desires the resumption of the prior relation on its own terms." (37 Harvard Law Review 486, at 488, 1924.)

Similarly a lock-out by the employer does not terminate the employment relation or destroy the status of the locked-out workers as employees. As was said by Grosscup, J., in his concurring opinion in Iron Molders Union v. Allis-Chalmers Co. (C. C. A. 7, 1908, 166 Fed. 45 at 52):

A strike is cessation of work by employees in an effort to get for the employees more desirable terms. A lock-out is a cessation of the furnishing of work to employees in an effort to get for the employer more desirable terms. Neither strike nor lock-out completely terminates, when this is its purpose, the relationship between the parties. The employees who remain to take part in the strike or weather the lock-out do so that they may be ready to go to work again on terms to which they shall agree—the employer remaining ready to take them back on terms to which he shall agree. Manifestly, then, pending a strike or lock-out, and as to those who have not finally and in good faith abandoned it, a relationship exists between employer and employee that is neither that of the general relation of employer and employee nor again that of employer looking among strangers for employees or employees seeking from strangers employment.

Even an attempted discharge of strikers does not sever the employment relation or destroy the status of the strikers as employees. As was said by Chief Justice Taft in American Steel Foundries v. Tri-City Central Trades Council (257 U. S. 184 (1921)), referring to section 20 of the Clayton Act:

It is clear that Congress intended to forbid the use by the Federal courts of their equity arm to prevent peaceable persuasion by employees, discharged or expectant, in promotion of their side of the dispute * * *

Moreover, used as a means of weakening an organization of employees, or as a means of refusing to negotiate with them about terms and conditions of employment, the right to fire has no place and is unlawful under sections 7 and 8 (1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act (49 Stat. 449, 1935). The latter of these sections provides that it is unfair labor practice for an employer—

By discrimination in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization.

Therefore a discharge of strikers because of a labor dispute cannot be deemed effective so as to cut off the employees' rights in their status and in their employment relation. See Matter of Bell Oil & Gas Co. and Local Union 258 (1 National Labor Relations Board Decisions 562 (1936)); Matter of Foster Bros. Manufacturing Co. and Federal Labor Union (1 National Labor Relations Board Decisions 880 (1936)).

An attempted discharge of striking employees is, in practical and legal effect, equivalent to a lock-out. See Matter of Sands Mfg. Co. and M. E. S. A. (1 National Labor Relations Board Decisions 546, at 558), where the company was said to have "locked out, discharged, and refused employment" to their union employees. As has already been shown, the action of the employer in locking out his employees will not operate to sever the employment relation or destroy the employee status.

The foregoing rules regarding the continuance of the employment relation during a labor dispute were concisely enacted in the statutory law by Congress in section 2 (3) of the National Labor Relations Act, which provides:

The term "employee" shall include * * * any individual whose work has ceased as a consequence of, or in connection with any current labor dispute or because of any unfair labor practice, and who has not obtained any other regular and substantially equivalent employment.

It is, therefore, clear that sit-down strikers retain their status as employees and continue to enjoy all the rights and privileges incident to their employment relation. Since they remain employees of the company, having the rights and privileges accompanying that status, it is impossible to hold them trespassers on account of their peaceful and temporary presence on the company's premises.

B. Occupation is incident of employment relation

Occupation of a plant, in good faith and peacefully, by employees awaiting the adjustment of difference growing out of their employment is but an incident of the employment relation and is in no sense unlawful.

Sit-down strikers do not come upon the premises of the company as uninvited strangers who have no claim of right to be there. They are invited upon the premises as the employees of the owner, and their remaining there is an incident of their employment relation. If more were needed it may properly be said that as a matter of law they have a license coupled with an interest in the premises devoted to the industrial enterprise. As has been shown, they remain, during the full period of the dispute, the employees of the owner of the premises.

The sit-down strikers remain in their place of employment as men with a stake in their jobs, which they are seeking to retain and improve. This is their right. For their jobs—their employment relations—constitute property rights. Their sole purpose, rather than to sever the relationship, is to maintain it and better it.

The historical development of the principle that employees have a property right in their job is strikingly shown in a series of Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court cases (Corneleier v. Haverhill Shoemakers Ass'n, 221 Mass. 554; Plant v. Woods, 176 Mass. 492; Worthington v. Waring, 157 Mass. 421) culminating in Bogni v. Perotti (224 Mass. 152). In the last-mentioned case the court declared unconstitutional an early anti-injunction statute which declared that the employment relation was a personal and not a property right. In the course of the opinion, the court said:

That the right to work is property cannot be regarded longer as an open question * * *. The right to work is property * * * as much property as the more obvious forms of goods and merchandise, stocks, and bonds * * *. To the extent that the laborer is not given the same security to his property by the law that is granted to the landowner or capitalist, to that extent discrimination is exercised against him * * *. It is primary and fundamental in any correct conception of justice that the laboring man stands on a level equal with all others before the courts. Whatever may be his social or economic condition outside, when he enters the court, the law can permit no rule to fetter him in the prosecution of his claims or the preservation of his rights which does not apply equally to all others respecting the same kinds of claims and rights.

Substantially the same language is to be found in the cases of State v. Stewart (59 Vt. 273), Erdman v. Mitchell (207 Pa. 79), Auburn Draying Co. v. Wardell (227 N. Y. 1), Hilton v. Sheridan Coal Co. (132 Kans. 525).

The property interest of a person in his job or employment has explicitly been held to constitute a legal limitation upon the power of an owner of land with respect to control of the land. In Carnes v. St. Paul Union Stockyards Co. (164 Minn. 457) the plaintiff sued for an injunction to restrain the interference with his employment by the defendant stockyard owner, who attempted to exclude the plaintiff from his land by refusing to make contracts with the plaintiff's employers. The court entered a decree for the plaintiff, saying:

The courts generally hold that a man's occupation or means of gaining a livelihood is his property.

Speaking in broader terms, the sit-down strikers in protecting and seeking to improve their jobs are protecting their livelihood and the means of subsistence for themselves and their families. These workmen, in the great majority of cases, have spent years training their hands and senses to specialized skills, have set up habitations located suitably to their places of work, have assumed the obligations and burdens of rearing and supporting families, have, in short, developed disciplines and ordered their lives to the end that the properties essential to the industry might yield to the owner a profit and to themselves a living. This is their investment in the industrial enterprise. Their outlays in daily work may be less visible and spectacular and less easily measured in dollars than those of capital made by the owner. Yet their contribution is no less essential to the function and operation of a going concern than that of the owner.

In the famous case of Iron Molders Union v. Allis-Chalmers Co. (C. C. A. 7, 1908, 166 Fed. 45), the court said that—

Dividends and wages must both come from the joint product of capital and labor.

The owner of this going concern has a right to protect, or to have protected by law, that which he has contributed—capital and physical property—from unjustified interferences. He is entitled to immunity from physical damage, immunity from unfair competition, the right as against strangers to a free flow of labor and access to raw materials and consumers' markets, the right to insist upon competent service by employees, and, finally, the right to wind up the enterprise.

Likewise the employees have the right to protect, or to have legally protected, their interests in the enterprise: their right to safe premises on which to work, to a living wage, and to fair treatment by the employer, and their right to carry on their group organizations for betterment of their conditions without interference by discharge, blacklist, or other coercion by the employer, and, finally, they have an inalienable right to insist that the employer negotiate with them the differences between them and to adopt those means reasonably necessary to induce the employer so to negotiate.

The sit-down strikers, then, are temporarily occupying, peacefully and in good faith, the plant devoted to the common enterprise. They are remaining on the premises as employees and awaiting the adjustment of differences growing out of their employment. They are seeking to protect and improve their jobs, in which they have a property right. Their presence on the premises of the company is but an incident of their employment relation and is in no sense unlawful.

II. LEGAL JUSTIFICATION FOR INTERFERENCES WITH PROPERTY INTERESTS

Sit-down strikers, because of the full legal justification for their acts, clearly do not remain upon the premises of the company in violation of the law.

A. Doctrine of justification

An act which would otherwise be a legal wrong is not such if it is legally justified.

It is well established that the mere causation of harm, whether physical or pecuniary, does not necessarily entail civil or criminal liability. Even intentional causation of harm does not in all cases involve civil or criminal liability.

Such liability follows only if a harm is caused, in the traditional language of the law, "without just cause", without legal "justification", without any "privilege" to do so, or, as typical criminal statutes, "without right", or "wrongfully." As was said by Lord Bowen in the leading case of Mogul Steamship Co. v. MacGregor, Gow & Co. (1889), L. R., 23 Q. B. D. 598:

> Assume that what is done is intentional and that it is calculated to do harm to others, then comes the question, Was it done with or without "just cause or justification"? * * * If the real object were to enjoy what was one's own, or to acquire for one's self some advantage in one's property or trade, and what was done honestly, peaceably, and without any of the illegal action above referred to (violence, breach of contract, fraud, etc.), it could not, in my opinion, properly be said that it was done without just cause or excuse.

Mr. Justice Holmes called it a "commonplace" that:

> The intentional infliction of temporal damage, or the doing of an act manifestly likely to inflict such damage, and inflicting it, is actionable if done without just cause. ("Privilege", Malice and Intent, 8 Harv. L. R. 1 (1894); Collected Legal Papers, at 119 (1921).)

As Mr. Justice Brandeis, dissenting in Truax v. Corrigan, 257 U. S. 312 (1921), said:

> The employer has, of course, a legal right to carry on his business for profit, and incidentally the subsidiary rights to secure and retain customers, to fix such prices for his product as he deems proper, and to buy merchandise and labor at such prices as he chooses to pay. This right to carry on business—be it called liberty or property—has value; and he who interferes with the right without cause renders himself liable. But for cause the right may be interfered with and even be destroyed. Such cause exists when, in the pursuit of an equal right to further their several interests, his competitors make inroads upon his trade, or when suppliers of merchandise or of labor make inroads upon his profits.

See also Cohn & Roth Electric Co. v. Bricklayers Union (92 Conn. 161 (1917)).

Other illustrations of this principle are legion. One may intentionally commit a battery upon another without civil or criminal liability if he is acting in self-defense or in defense of a relative or in defense of his property against the aggression of the other. (For illustrations see American Law Institute, Restatement of the Law of Torts, vol. 1, chap. 4, secs. 63–156.)

Invasions of the right to exclusive possession of land are no exceptions to this rule. Entries upon land are not actionable trespasses if they are justified or privileged by law, even in the absence of the owner's consent. In chapter 6, topic 2, of the Restatement of the Law of Torts, supra, examples of this principle are given: Privilege of entry upon land by a traveler, even if forbidden by the owner, if the highway is impassable, or if he "reasonably believes" the highway to be impassable, sections 192, 195; right of entry to protect one's self from personal injury, 197; to retrieve a chattel, 199; to abate a nuisance, 201; to perform a public duty, 202–204, 211; to prevent crime, 205–207; to serve process, 208, 209. The Restatement specifically states:

> These rules are not intended to be exclusive. There may be other circumstances which give rise to such a privilege. (Restatement, p. 319).

Indeed, the owner of land is himself subject to liability if he resists an entry upon his land by a person who has just cause therefor (Vincent v. Lake Erie Transportation Co., 109 Minn. 456 (1910); Ploof v. Putnam, 81 Vt. 471 (1908), 83 Vt. 252, 494 (1910)).

B. Justification in Labor Disputes

In labor disputes, collective action which constitutes an invasion of the employer's interests is not a legal wrong if it is justified and if the purposes are lawful and the means are lawful.

A labor dispute justifies harm to the employer—justifies an invasion of his property interests—if the invasion is for a valid purpose and if the means employed are proper. It does not matter what property interest is invaded. The employer has a "property right" in his business (Truax v. Corrigan, 257 U. S. 312 (1921); Duplex Printing Press Co. v. Deering, 254 U. S. 443 (1921)). He has a similar interest in a free labor market (Hitchman Coal & Coke Co. v. Mitchell, 245 U. S. 229 (1917)); and in access to the consumers' market (Gompers v. Buck Stove & Range Co., 221 U. S. 418 (1911); Loewe v. Lawlor, 208 U. S. 274 (1908)). These property rights of an employer are of equal dignity before the courts with his property right in his land. They are given as full legal protection. Yet they are not immune from justified harms inflicted in the course of a labor dispute. It necessarily follows that in the case of a sit-down strike the company's interest in its land is not immune from a justified invasion where the purposes of the strikers are lawful and their means are lawful.

1. The lawfulness of the purpose

The employees' purpose in a typical sit-down strike is a legal one—to advance their own interests by establishing their legal right of collective bargaining and by strengthening their union. In Exchange Bakery and Restaurant, Inc., v. Rifkin (245 N. Y. 260 (1927)), the court declared:

> The purpose of a labor union to improve the conditions under which its members do their work; to increase their wages; to assist them in other ways, may justify what would otherwise be a wrong.

In Campbell v. Gates (236 N. Y. 457), the court held that, in order to maintain an action for inducing breach of contract, the plaintiff must show "the intentional doing of a wrongful act without legal or social justification." In the case of a sit-down strike, the legal justification for the interference with the employer's property rights is that the employees are seeking only to advance their own interests; the social justification is that they are seeking only to improve the conditions under which they work and live.

The classic statement of the principle of justification was made by Mr. Justice Holmes more than 40 years ago in Vegelahn v. Guntner (167 Mass. 92 (1896)). In his dissent he said:

> In numberless instances the law warrants the intentional infliction of temporal damage because it regards it as justified. * * * The policy of allowing free competition justifies the intentional inflicting of temporary damage, including the damage of interference with a man's business, by some means, when the damage is done not for its own sake but as an instrumentality in reaching the end of victory in the battle of trade. * * * I have seen the suggestion made that the conflict between employers and employed is not competition. But I venture to assume that none of my brethren would rely on that suggestion. If the policy on which our law is founded is too narrowly expressed in the term "free competition", we may substitute "free struggle for life." Certainly the policy is not limited to struggles between persons of the same class competing for the same end. It applies to all conflicts of temporal interests. * * * One of the eternal conflicts out of which life is made up is that between the effort of every man to get the most he can for his services, and that of society, disguised under the name of capital, to get his services for the least possible return. Combination on the one side is patent and powerful. Combination on the other is the necessary and desirable counterpart, if the battle is to be carried on in a fair and equal way.

An important case following this principle is Cohn & Roth Electric Co. v. Bricklayers Union (92 Conn. 161 (1917)). In refusing to enjoin defendants from carrying on a strike to achieve the closed shop, the court in that case said:

The end the defendants had in view by their bylaws was the strengthening of their unions. * * * There was no indication that the real purpose of the defendants was injury to the plaintiff or the nonunion men. * * * Whatever injury was done the plaintiff was a consequence of trade competition and an incident to a course of conduct by the defendants, begun and prosecuted for their own legitimate interests.

The ends that sit-down strikers have in view are to advance their own interests, to strengthen their union, and to secure for themselves the right of collective bargaining. Clearly these ends are lawful.

As has been shown, sit-down strikers remain on the company's premises as employees, seeking to protect and improve their jobs. They have a property right in these jobs (see above). Their primary purpose is to safeguard this property right, and not to injure the company. That the company does, in fact, suffer a temporary invasion of its interest in its land is merely incidental. This invasion is justified under the law.

The typical sit-down strike arises out of the refusal of the company to negotiate with the union and to abide by the law of the land as set out in the National Labor Relations Act. The workmen demand that the company obey the law; they insist that the company recognize their union as their agent for collective bargaining (National Labor Relations Act, secs. 7, 9); that the company refrain from discrimination against any of them because of union activity (id., sec. 8 (1), (3)); and that the company refrain from engaging in any of the other activities proscribed by the act, which interfere with their right of collective bargaining.

A denial of this fundamental right of collective bargaining justifies, by way of self-defense, peaceful and temporary interference with the property interests of the owner who denies this right.

The right of organization into unions for the purpose of collective bargaining has long been recognized by the courts. Mr. Chief Justice Taft, speaking for the United States Supreme Court, stated the law as follows:

Labor unions are recognized by the Clayton Act as legal when instituted for mutual help and lawfully carrying out their legitimate objects. They have long been thus recognized by the courts. They were organized out of the necessities of the situation. A single employee was helpless in dealing with an employer. He was dependent ordinarily on his daily wage for the maintenance of himself and family. If the employer refused to pay him the wages he thought fair, he was nevertheless unable to leave the employ and to resist arbitrary and unfair treatment. Union was essential to give laborers an opportunity to deal on equality with their employer (American Steel Foundries v. Tri-City Central Trades Council, 257 U. S. 184 (1921)).

Likewise in Iron Molders Union v. Allis-Chalmers Co. (C. C. A. 7, 1908, 166 Fed. 45) Judge Baker said:

To whatever extent employers may lawfully combine and cooperate to control the supply and conditions of work to be done, to the same extent should be recognized the right of workmen to combine and cooperate to control the supply and the conditions of the labor that is necessary to the doing of the work. In the fullest recognition of the equality and mutuality of their rights and their restrictions lies the peace of capital and labor.

The right to organize and bargain collectively has also been denominated a property interest by the United States Supreme Court. In the case of Texas and New Orleans R. Co. v. Railway Clerks (281 U. S. 548 (1930)), in which the union sought to enjoin the company from interfering with its right to collective bargaining by means of a company union, the Supreme Court affirmed a decree for the plaintiff union, saying, in part:

If it could be said that it was necessary in the present instance to show a property interest in the employees in order to justify the Court in granting an injunction, we are of the opinion that there was such an interest, with respect to the selection of representatives to confer with the employer in relation to contracts of service, as satisfied the statutory requirement. [Sec. 20, Clayton Act.]

This was a unanimous opinion written by Chief Justice Hughes, Justice McReynolds not sitting in the case; and was cited in Virginian R. Co. v. System Federation (84 Fed. (2d) 641 (C. C. A. 4), for the proposition that—

The right of self-organization and representation in the matter of rates of pay, hours of labor, and working conditions is a property right, the loss of which would result in irreparable damage to complainants.

Not only have the courts recognized the rights of workers to organize and bargain collectively but also Congress has guaranteed to them these rights. Section 1 of the National Labor Relations Act declares:

It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to eliminate the causes of certain substantial obstructions to the free flow of commerce and to mitigate and eliminate these obstructions when they have occurred by encouraging the practice and procedure of collective bargaining and by protecting the exercise by workers of full freedom of association, self-organization, and designation of representatives of their own choosing for the purpose of negotiating the terms and conditions of their employment or other mutual aid or protection.

Behind the National Labor Relations Act is a long history of the recognition of the rights of workers to organize and bargain collectively. The Industrial Commission established by Congress in 1898 pointed out in its Final Report (1902, vol. 19, p. 844) the great "advantage which comes from the practice of periodically determining the conditions of labor by collective bargaining. Similar conclusions were reached by the Anthracite Coal Strike Commission (Report, 1902, S. Doc. 6, 58th Cong., special sess., p. 64). The National War Labor Board declared as its policy that—

The rights of workers to organize in trade unions and to bargain collectively, through chosen representatives, is recognized and affirmed. This right shall not be denied, abridged, or interfered with by the employers in any manner whatsoever.

This policy was also followed during the war by all other governmental agencies concerned with labor relations, including the Shipbuilding Labor Adjustment Board, the Director General of Railroads, the National Adjustment Commission, which worked with the United States Shipping Board, and the Division of Marine and Dock Industrial Relations of the same Board. (See National War Labor Board, Principles and Rules of Procedure, 1919, p. 4; Bulletin No. 283, U. S. Bureau of Labor Statistics, pp. 98–102. See also, Final Report of Commission on Industrial Relations (1916), S. Doc. 415, 64th Cong., 1st sess., vol. I, pp. 61–68, 162, 215, 235, and Report of Industrial Conference called by the President (Mar. 6, 1920), pp. 15–24.)

State legislatures and administrative bodies have similarly recognized and have sought to guarantee the workers' right to organize and bargain collectively. (See 30 Illinois Law Review 854–883 (1936).)

It cannot be questioned, therefore, that the purposes of sit-down strikers to advance their own interests, to strengthen their organizations, and to improve the conditions under which they work and live are entirely proper. They are seeking ends which our courts have repeatedly declared lawful; they are attempting to exercise rights which Congress and the legislatures have expressly guaranteed. In peacefully and temporarily remaining upon the premises of the company, in order to induce the employer to bargain collectively with them, they are acting to protect these established rights. To hold sit-down strikers under these circumstances to be trespassers would be not only to brand as law-breakers men, who are acting within their rights, but also to deny them these rights.

2. The lawfulness of the means

Not only, in the typical sit-down strike, are the strikers' purposes legal, but also the means employed by them to effect these purposes are legal. They are peacefully waiting on the premises of the company until their complaints are considered through negotiations between their representatives and the representatives of the company. They do not operate nor injure the owner's physical property. They make no adverse claim to possession of the premises upon which they remain.

The law has undergone vital changes in the past 100 years respecting the rights of workers and the means which they are privileged to use in their collective struggle for a better life.

In England a workingman struggling to improve his condition, even when acting singly, was confronted until 1813 with laws limiting the amount of wages he might demand. Until 1824 he was punishable as a criminal if he combined with his fellow workmen to raise wages or shorten hours or to affect the business in any way, even if there was no resort to a strike. Until 1871 members of the union who joined in persuading employees to leave work were liable criminally, although the employees were not under contract and the persuasion was both peaceful and unattended by picketing. Until 1871 threatening a strike, whatever the cause, was also a criminal act. Not until 1875 was the right of workers to combine in order to attain their ends conceded fully. * * * Not until 1906 was the ban on peaceful picketing and the bringing of pressure upon an employer by means of a secondary strike or a boycott removed. In 1906 also the act of inducing workers to break their contract of employment (previously held an actionable wrong) was expressly declared legal. * * *

In the United States the rules of the common law governing the struggle between employer and employee have likewise been subjected to modifications. These have been made mainly through judicial decisions. The legal right of workingmen to combine and to strike in order to secure for themselves higher wages, shorter hours, and better conditions received early general recognition. But there developed great diversity of opinion as to the means by which, and also as to the persons through whom, and upon whom pressure might permissibly be exerted in order to induce the employer to yield to the demands of the workingmen. * * * The earliest reported American decision on peaceful picketing appears to have been rendered in 1888; the earliest on boycotting in 1886. * * * The prevailing judicial opinion in America * * * inclines toward the legality of peaceful picketing. * * * In some States, notably New York, both peaceful picketing and the boycott are declared permissible. (Mr. Justice Brandeis dissenting in Truax v. Corrigan, 257 U. S. 312 (1921).)

The test of the lawfulness of the means used by employees to advance their interests and enforce their rights is whether those means constitute "reasonable conduct under all the circumstances" (White Mountain Freezer Co. v. Murphy, 78 N. H. 398 (1917)). Or, as was said in Kemp v. Division No. 241, 255 Ill. 213 (1912):

If it is proper for workingmen to organize themselves into such combinations as labor unions, it must necessarily follow that it is proper for them to adopt any proper means to preserve that organization.

In the typical case the employer, a powerful corporation, has been abusing its power in refusing to bargain collectively with the representatives of the employees. In so doing it is violating the policy and law of the land. In the absence of enforcement of this policy and law by public authorities the employees, after exhausting all other means, seek in a peaceful and orderly manner to take those steps necessary to protect the rights and privileges conferred upon them by the law of our court decisions and statutes. In the light of these facts it cannot be said that a sit-down strike is not "reasonable conduct under all the circumstances", or that these are not "proper means to preserve their organization."

In the case of a sit-down strike, the only possible charge of impropriety or illegality is the mere fact of the invasion of the owner's property interest in his land. But that invasion by itself cannot make the sit-down strikers' means illegal, because such an invasion is present in all cases, including those which are concededly legal. Thus, peaceful picketing, which is obviously an invasion of the employer's property right in his business, is a recognized legal means. Peaceful picketing is used and is effective only insofar as it is designed to cause the employer loss—loss of custom, or loss of free access to the labor market. But "resulting injury [from peaceful picketing] is incidental, and it must be endured." Stillwell Theatre, Inc., v. Kaplan (259 N. Y. 405 (1932)). As was said in Pickett v. Walsh (192 Mass. 572 (1906)):

The fact that the business of a plaintiff is destroyed by the acts of the defendants [union members] done in pursuance of their right of competition [for jobs] is not decisive of the illegality of the acts.

Compare Martell v. White (185 Mass. 255). Likewise Judge Amidon in Great Northern Railway v. Brosseau (286 Fed. 414 (1923)), speaking of the Clayton Act, said:

Given the existence of such controversy as the law specifies [a labor dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment], then the doing of the acts named in it is rightful, notwithstanding such conduct causes obstruction to commerce and the mails and inflicts irreparable injury upon the company and the public.

In a sit-down strike the employees inflict no greater injury upon the property interests of the company than what was held to be lawfully inflicted in the foregoing and other cases. It follows, therefore, that if the only charge of illegality or impropriety in the case of a sit-down strike is that the means used invade the owner's property interests the charge is insufficient. And, inasmuch as the purpose is legal, the temporary invasion of property interests is justified.

It has thus been demonstrated that this temporary invasion of the company's property interests is justified because the purposes of the sit-down strikers are proper and because the means used are "reasonable under all the circumstances" and necessary and proper to preserve the union organization. And since temporary invasions of property interests which are justified are not unlawful, it must be concluded that the sit-down strike is not unlawful.

SUMMARY AND CONCLUSION

The sit-down strike is a lawful method by which workingmen, in the face of refusal by the employer to abide by the law of the land and respect their rights, seek to protect their rights and to improve their conditions. Sit-down strikers are not trespassers because they come upon the premises as employees at the company's invitation and because they remain throughout the labor dispute in the status of employees of the company. As employees they enjoy all the legal rights and privileges which accompany the employment relation.

Moreover, sit-down strikers have a property right in their jobs which the law permits them to protect by appropriate means. They also have a property interest in the right to organize and bargain collectively.

The purposes of a sit-down strike, to secure the fundamental right to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, are conceded by all to be lawful. The means employed by sit-down strikers to carry out these purposes are the only effective and reasonable means under all the circumstances and are also within the law which permits peaceful activities by workingmen, even if they temporarily interfere with the property interests of the employer.

Whether there is an interference with the property interests of the employer is not the issue, for such interference is present in the case of the strike, picketing, the boycott, or other concededly legal collective action by employees to better their conditions. The issue is whether this interference is justified. The lawfulness of the sit-down strikers' purposes, and the fact that the unlawful activities of the employer leave them no other means which are reasonably effective, provide the justification for the temporary interference with the company's property interests.

Therefore the sit-down strike is legal. [Applause.]

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. COLDEN].

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Chariman, I was very much gratified this afternoon to hear two of my colleagues from California [Mr. SCOTT and Mr. VOORHIS] discuss the other side of this question of sit-down strikes. For many days I have been listening to criticisms of the Secretary of Labor and particularly of the sit-down strikers in this country. I have often felt that we do not go far enough into this question. I am not here to defend the breaking of the laws of this country, I am here to call the attention of the House to something that is even deeper than the law of this country, and that is the foundation of justice upon which the law of this land is based.

I do not believe that the sit-down strikers have been the only ones who have offended this principle of government. We have witnessed the spectacle of many of the big industries of the country locking the doors of their plants and disregarding the rights of labor. When the man who owns a factory finds he is not making a profit, it frequently suits his purpose to close the doors regardless of the rights of those who have made his industry and his wealth possible. Not only have captains of industry been guilty of violating the rights of labor, but we also have the spectacle of many very prominent men in the financial affairs of this country ruthlessly breaking the laws of the country. It has been done so often. The workingman has seen his wages depressed. He has lost his savings in the banks. He has even lost his home because of the disregard by others of his rights in life. He has also witnessed numerous injunctions, and sometimes it seems to the layman an abuse of the power of the courts and of the law in depriving labor at least of its moral rights.

For instance, take the tobacco industry, in which there appears one of the most startling revelations I have ever listened to on this floor. I refer to the immense profits of the tobacco trust and the miserable starvation wages that are paid to the employees and to the farmers who produce the product. It riles me and I feel that my own rights, as well as the rights of my fellow citizens are being violated by these ruthless practices indulged in by men of great wealth in this country. If labor has indulged in some excesses, assuming they have violated the law, they have a thousand precedents by others in the past on which they may feel they were justified in doing some of the things they did to obtain their rights.

Mr. Chairman, many years ago I read a book on philosophy and economics by Henry George on the single tax. I never was convinced that Henry George's theory was a remedy for our industrial and economic ills, but I did learn one thing from him. I learned something about unearned increment and I learned something about social values in this country. I have come to the conclusion that all values and all wealth is largely a matter of society. Henry George speaks of land alone, but I call your attention to the fact that the Steel Trust, the automobile companies, or any other industrial enterprise in this country would have no value if it were not for population and the buying power of society. The social value reaches out far beyond the land and into every activity of our country.

It seems to me one of the wrongs of our industrial life is that a few men manage and control enterprise and take all its profits.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from California.

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Chairman, I believe that a worker has a moral right to a portion of the profits of these great enterprises. If we had a proper distribution of wealth in this country the worker who helps produce this wealth would also share in it and I think it is morally wrong that a few men should take unto themselves all the profits of these great enterprises.

We have heard a great deal on this floor about supremacy of law, but I repeat, there is something more grand, there is something nobler, than supremacy of law. That is the supremacy of justice to labor in this country as well as to those who revel in the wealth of this Nation. [Applause.]

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LUCAS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 5966, the legislative appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1938, had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. RAMSAY, for 3 days, on account of business.

To Mr. CULLEN, for the balance of the week, on account of serious illness in family.

To Mrs. JENCKES of Indiana, for 1 week, on account of important official business.

SETTLEMENT OF CLAIMS ON ACCOUNT OF CIVILIAN CONSERVATION CORPS

Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 2773, to authorize the settlement of individual claims for personal property lost or damaged, arising out of the activities of the Civilian Conservation Corps, which have been approved by the Secretary of War, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Page 1, line 5, strike out "not otherwise appropriated" and insert "allocated by the President for the maintenance and operation of the Civilian Conservation Corps."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

E. C. WILLIS

Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 3630) for the relief of E. C. Willis, father of the late Charles R. Willis, a minor, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Page 1, line 5, strike out "not otherwise appropriated" and insert "allocated by the President for the maintenance and operation of the Civilian Conservation Corps."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

MARY DALEY

Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 635) for the relief of Mary Daley, with a Senate amendment, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Page 1, line 5, strike out "not otherwise appropriated" and insert "allocated by the President for the maintenance and operation of the Civilian Conservation Corps."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL FIREARMS ACT

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution for immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 170

Resolved, That the bill (S. 1905) to amend the National Firearms Act, passed June 26, 1934, in the opinion of this House contravenes that clause of the Constitution of the United States requiring revenue bills to originate in the House of Representatives and is an infringement of the prerogatives of this House, and that said bill be respectfully returned to the Senate with a message communicating this resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL, 1938

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on tomorrow, when consideration of the bill (H. R. 5966) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and for other purposes, is resumed, general debate may proceed for 2 hours, the time to be equally divided between the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. POWERS] and myself, and that the bill be then read for amendment under the 5-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

SENATE BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED

Bills and a joint resolution of the Senate of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and, under the rule, referred as follows:

S. 102. An act to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the seventy-fifth anniversary of the Battle of Antietam; to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

S. 451. An act for the relief of Farley J. Holloman; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 673. An act for the relief of S. T. Dickinson; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 790. An act to repeal section 13 of the act entitled "An act to regulate interstate and foreign commerce in petroleum and its products by prohibiting the shipment in such commerce of petroleum and its products produced in violation of State law, and for other purposes", approved February 22, 1935; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 812. An act for the relief of E. P. Conroy and Graham Conroy; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 893. An act for the relief of Jack Wade, Perry Shilton, Louie Hess, Owen Busch, and William W. McGregor; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 1077. An act to amend the act creating the Federal Trade Commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 1081. An act for the relief of H. G. Carriere, Charles E. Livingston, and John Latham; to the Committee on Claims.

S. J. Res. 64. Joint resolution defining the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims under the acts approved March 19, 1924 (43 Stat. 27), and April 25, 1932 (47 Stat. 137), and for other purposes; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

SENATE ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled joint resolutions of the Senate of the following titles:

S. J. Res. 66. Joint resolution providing for the participation by the United States in the Greater Texas and Pan American Exposition to be held in the State of Texas during the year 1937; and

S. J. Res. 75. Joint resolution making funds available for the control of incipient or emergency outbreaks of insect pests or plant diseases, including grasshoppers, Mormon crickets, and chinch bugs.

BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee did on Monday, March 29, 1937, present to the President, for his approval, bills of the House of the following titles:

H. R. 1088. An act for the relief of the Baker-Whiteley Coal Co.;

H. R. 1089. An act for the relief of Charles M. Perkins;

H. R. 1091. An act for the relief of Capt. J. H. Merriam, Supply Corps, United States Navy; and

H. R. 1094. An act for the relief of Clark F. Potts and Charles H. Barker.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 39 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, March 31, 1937, at 12 o'clock noon.

COMMITTEE HEARINGS

COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS

There will be a meeting of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds at 10 a. m., Wednesday, March 31, 1937. Business to be considered: Hearings on H. R. 1658, to amend the act entitled "An act authorizing the erection for the sole use of the Pan American Union of an office building on the square of land lying between Eighteenth Street, C Street, and Virginia Avenue NW., in the city of Washington, D. SENATE

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 31, 1937

(Legislative day of Monday, Mar. 29, 1937)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock, on the expiration of the recess.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. ROBINSON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of the calendar day Tuesday, March 30, 1937, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States, submitting several nominations, were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Megill, one of its clerks, announced that the House had severally agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the following bills of the House:

H. R. 635. An act for the relief of Mary Daley;

H. R. 2773. An act to authorize the settlement of individual claims for personal property lost or damaged, arising out of the activities of the Civilian Conservation Corps, which have been approved by the Secretary of War; and

H. R. 3630. An act for the relief of E. C. Willis, father of the late Charles R. Willis, a minor.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to a concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 7), in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That in accordance with paragraph 3 of section 2 of the Printing Act approved March 1, 1907, the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation be, and is hereby, empowered to have printed for its use 5,000 additional copies of its report entitled "The Taxing Power of the Federal and State Governments."

The message further announced that the House had agreed to a resolution (H. Res. 170), as follows:

Resolved, That the bill (S. 1905) to amend the National Firearms Act, approved June 26, 1934, in the opinion of this House contravenes that clause of the Constitution of the United States requiring revenue bills to originate in the House of Representatives, and is an infringement of the prerogatives of this House, and that said bill be respectfully returned to the Senate with a message communicating this resolution.

(Pursuant to the above House resolution, the message returned Senate bill 1905 to the Senate.)

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

The messages also announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills, and they were signed by the Vice President:

H. R. 635. An act for the relief of Mary Daley;

H. R. 2773. An act to authorize the settlement of individual claims for personal property lost or damaged, arising out of the activities of the Civilian Conservation Corps, which have been approved by the Secretary of War; and

H. R. 3630. An act for the relief of E. C. Willis, father of the late Charles R. Willis, a minor.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I am called on to announce the absence of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. DONAHEY], caused by illness.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] are detained from the Senate on important public business. I ask that this announcement go in the RECORD for the day.

Mr. AUSTIN. I announce that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] is absent on official business and that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] is absent because of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

CHOPAWAMSIC RECREATIONAL DEMONSTRATION PROJECT, DUMFRIES, VA.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to provide for the operation of the recreational facilities within the Chopawamsic recreational demonstration project near Dumfries, Va., by the Secretary of the Interior through the National Park Service, and for other purposes, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

REPORT OF THE AMERICAN WAR MOTHERS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the national president of the American War Mothers, transmitting, pursuant to law, the report of that organization for the period from October 4, 1935, to October 4, 1936, which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of New Mexico, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys:

Joint memorial of the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of New Mexico to the Congress of the United States of America, requesting not to pass any measure now pending before said Congress which seeks additional lands in the State of New Mexico for use by the Indians

Whereas there have been introduced in the Congress of the United States certain bills which have for their purpose the increasing or extending of the Navajo Indian Reservation in the State of New Mexico by some 3,500,000 acres; and

Whereas the Federal Government for several years has been purchasing large tracts of lands in the State of New Mexico, and, particularly, has been purchasing large tracts of lands in old Spanish land grants, to be designated for the use of the Indians; and

Whereas the continuation of the policy of the Federal Government in acquiring large tracts of land and in the extension of the Navajo Indian Reservation in New Mexico by 3,500,000 acres is detrimental to the economic and social welfare of the citizens of the State of New Mexico, and would work a hardship upon stockraisers and upon those industries closely associated and connected with the stock-raising industry; and

Whereas the continuation of the policy of the Federal Government in obtaining large tracts of land in New Mexico necessarily takes all of said lands off the tax rolls of New Mexico, and the revenue derived therefrom as taxes is lost to the citizens of New Mexico: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of New Mexico respectfully and earnestly memorialize and request the Congress of the United States of America not to pass any measures now before said Congress which seek additional lands for the use of the Indians in the State of New Mexico; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this memorial be sent to the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, the Secretary of the Interior, and to the respective Senators and Representative of New Mexico in the Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following resolution of the General Court of Massachusetts, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration:

Resolution memorializing Congress in favor of restoring certain women to citizenship

Whereas certain women who were citizens of the United States, either by reason of being American born or by naturalization of a parent while they themselves were minors, lost said citizenship by marriage to alien husbands between March 2, 1907, and September 22, 1922; and

Whereas many of said women are still noncitizens because their husbands did not become naturalized between said dates of March 2, 1907, and September 22, 1922, and they themselves have not since September 22, 1922, secured papers in a court competent to grant naturalization restoring their citizenship; and

Whereas the securing of said papers by said women entails much inconvenience and expense and is repugnant to many of said women, who have been reared and educated in this country and who regard their exclusion from citizenship as a discrimination against them when other American women who married aliens before March 2, 1907, or since September 22, 1922, retained their citizenship; and

Whereas consistency in the policy of "once an American, always an American" requires that all American women who have married aliens be given the rights of citizenship: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Court of Massachusetts hereby respectfully requests that the Congress of the United States speedily enact specific legislation removing the discrimination against all said women and restoring their citizenship; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be sent by the secretary of the Commonwealth to the Clerk of each branch of Congress and to each Senator and Representative in Congress from this Commonwealth.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a resolution of the General Court of Massachusetts, favoring the appropriation of additional funds by the Government for the continuation of emergency unemployment relief projects, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

(See resolution printed in full when presented today by Mr. LODGE (for himself and Mr. WALSH).)

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a resolution of the General Court of Massachusetts, memorializing the President and Congress to allocate to the Commonwealth of Massachusetts a reasonable proportion of the total revenues appropriated for social purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Board of Commissioners of the city of Camden, N. J., favoring the enactment of pending legislation providing low-cost housing, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also laid before the Senate a letter in the nature of a memorial from M. Duvivier, secretary of the Asociacion de Empleados de San German, of San German, P. R., remonstrating against the appointment or retention of Enrique Rossy as acting postmaster at San German, P. R., which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. LODGE presented memorials of sundry citizens of the State of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to reorganize the judicial branch of the Government, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LODGE (for himself and Mr. WALSH) presented the following resolution of the General Court of Massachusetts, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

Resolutions memorializing Congress in favor of the appropriation of additional funds by the Federal Government for the continuation of emergency unemployment relief projects

Resolved, That the General Court of Massachusetts hereby urges the Congress of the United States to appropriate immediately additional funds so that emergency unemployment relief projects may be continued without interruption; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be sent forthwith by the secretary of the Commonwealth to the President of the United States, to the presiding officer of each branch of Congress, and to the Members thereof from this Commonwealth.

Mr. LODGE also (for himself and Mr. WALSH) presented the following resolution of the General Court of Massachusetts, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

Resolutions memorializing Congress and the President of the United States to allocate to this Commonwealth a reasonable proportion of the total revenues voted by Congress for social purposes

Whereas the Congress of the United States has for the past several years voted large sums of money to the Executive to be spent for social purposes, always hitherto the proper function of the several States of the Union, to wit, relief, local public works, low-cost housing, farm benefits, etc.; and

Whereas the Congress of the United States has spent during the calendar year 1936 on the average nearly $350,000,000 monthly for these purposes, as shown by the United States Treasury figures annexed hereto; and

Whereas the Commonwealth of Massachusetts recognizes that the taxing power of the Federal Government may spread the burden of collecting funds for such social purposes more equitably than the taxing facilities of the several States; and

Whereas the Commonwealth of Massachusetts also recognizes its own primary duty to care for the welfare of its citizens and the impracticability of performing that duty when Federal bureaus and officials invade a broad part of the field in which that duty must be performed—said invasion changing continuously and without advance information in complete disregard for the responsibilities of the properly constituted State and local authorities, thus placing our elected officials completely at the mercy of Washington bureaus: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Court of Massachusetts hereby most respectfully petitions the Congress of the United States and the President of the United States to allocate directly to the sovereign Commonwealth of Massachusetts a reasonable proportion of the total revenues voted by the Congress for the social purposes enumerated in this petition, in order that the elected officials of the Commonwealth may carry out a well-rounded program for the benefit of its citizens in conformity with the responsibilities and duties delegated to them by the Constitution of the United States, free from the imposition of Federal administrative authority; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be forwarded by the Secretary of the Commonwealth to each Member of the Congress and to the President of the United States.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 1263) to authorize the award of a decoration for distinguished service to George J. Frank, reported it with an amendment to the title and submitted a report (No. 275) thereon.

Mr. MINTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 1538) to correct the military record of John Pate, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 276) thereon.

Mr. SHEPPARD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 1572) for the relief of Frank Fisher, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 277) thereon.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 5299) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to exchange certain lands and water rights in Inyo and Mono Counties, Calif., with the city of Los Angeles, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 278) thereon.

Mr. DIETERICH, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 1431) limiting the operation of sections 109 and 113 of the Criminal Code and section 190 of the Revised Statutes of the United States with respect to counsel in certain cases, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 279) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. STEIWER:

A bill (S. 2032) granting a pension to John W. Bragg; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. POPE:

A bill (S. 2033) for the relief of Dr. F. F. McAtee; to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 2034) relating to personal-injury suits by seamen; to the Committee on Commerce.

A bill (S. 2035) to amend section 5 and section 33 of the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. GUFFEY:

A bill (S. 2036) for the relief of W. A. Merrill Sons & Co., Inc.; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. BULOW:

A bill (S. 2037) for the relief of E. E. McKean; and

A bill (S. 2038) for the relief of Jonathan L. Whitney; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. TRUMAN:

A bill (S. 2039) granting a pension to Gilbert Messick; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. GREEN:

A bill (S. 2040) to authorize the erection of a United States veterans' hospital in the State of Rhode Island; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. LEWIS:

A bill (S. 2041) for the relief of the heirs of the late Capt. N. C. Brooks; and

A bill (S. 2042) for the relief of Lester B. McAllister; to the Committee on Claims.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, the bill (S. 433) to provide for a survey of the Cabinet Gorge on the Clark Fork of the Columbia River was referred to the Committee on Commerce. Last year a similar bill was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation. That committee is entirely familiar with the bill, it having reported it last year, and the bill then having passed the Senate. I ask that the Committee on Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the change of reference will be made.

CROP INSURANCE SYSTEM FOR FRUITS AND VEGETABLES

Mr. PEPPER submitted a resolution (S. Res. 108), which was ordered to lie over under the rule, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture is requested to transmit to the Senate, at the earliest practicable date, a plan and recommendations for the establishment of a system of crop insurance for fruits and vegetables, and to make such studies as may be necessary in connection therewith.

MARCELLA J. M'GINN

Mr. McNARY submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 109), which was referred to the Committee to audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay from the contingent fund of the Senate to Marcella J. McGinn, widow of James W. McGinn, late an employee of the Senate under supervision of the Sergeant at Arms, a sum equal to 6 months' compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered inclusive of funeral expenses and all other allowances.

THE BRONSON CUTTING MEMORIAL LECTURES

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, during the winter months Mrs. Cutting, the mother of former Senator Bronson Cutting, has been providing a series of lectures as a tribute and as a memorial to her son. The lectures have been most valuable, and what she has done has been a fine and splendid thing. At the opening lecture the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] made some brief remarks concerning the work of Senator Cutting. I ask unanimous consent that the remarks made by the Senator from Nebraska at that time be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The address is as follows:

It is difficult for the mortal mind to reconcile the justice of the decree of a cruel fate that so tragically ended the career of Bronson Cutting in the early morning of his life. Those of us who knew him best and who loved him most had in our hearts for him so much of hope for the future, believing that much good for humanity would have come from his work had the span of his life not been cut short by a cruel and unheralded accident. The good he had accomplished, the work he had already performed in his courageous battle for the upbuilding of humanity and the betterment of civilization were so great that hope for the accomplishments of the future led the human mind into the realm of imagination.

When Senator Cutting passed into the limitless realm of eternity, struggling millions of the toilers of humanity lost an outstanding leader, a brave defender, and a courageous advocate. A man of wealth, his great heart beat in unison with the downtrodden and the oppressed and those who toil for their daily bread. All along the pathway of his life there are emblems of his charity, his generosity, his justice, and his mercy.

He never inquired into or considered the popularity of any cause. He was moved to action by what he conceived to be justice and righteousness. A man of superior educational qualifications, he never hesitated to come to the relief of those who were denied by poverty the opportunity to develop the mind as well as the heart.

He was a friend of education and of the public schools. He made a wonderful fight in the Senate to secure a definite guaranty that no public school should be closed for want of funds.

There was no limit to his courage. When his brilliant analytical mind determined upon the course that should be pursued in the fight against oppression and in behalf of a higher and better civilization, he never thought of the dangers or the hazards of the fight, but put his whole soul and his great manhood into the struggle regardless of personal consequences. When he became a Member of the Senate he was a stranger to most of its Members, but soon he commanded the respect and admiration of both friend and foe. The nobility of his character was recognized at once. The ability of his trained mind to solve difficult questions of politics or government soon became so apparent that, although young in years and service, he soon became a leader in that great legislative assembly.

He won this leadership not from social standing, not from wealth, not from political power, not from any of the methods of partisan political warfare, but from true merit. His intellectual ability gave him leadership; the truthfulness of his heart, the honesty of his purpose, and the courage of his assault brought respect and followers to his banners. In all the struggles of his career, honesty was his shield, wisdom was his weapon, and justice was his goal. I have no fear of contradiction when I say no Member of the Senate ever doubted his sincerity of purpose in any legislative struggle in which he participated. With a modesty that was unsurpassed, with a purpose that was undisguised, and with an honesty that was unquestioned, he always commanded the unlimited respect and admiration of all the Members of that distinguished body.

The world is better because Bronson Cutting lived. His heroic fight for equality before the law, his courageous attack upon the citadel of entrenched wealth and special privilege, his constant pleading for the rights and privileges of the poor and unfortunate, and his fervent appeal for the downtrodden and oppressed have given renewed hope and renewed vigor to millions of struggling mortals. No cold marble monument could commemorate properly the story of his life. It is the belief of his friends that the lesson of his life, his influence upon progressive thought and legislation in the past, may be put to more useful service by carrying on the teachings of his creed by planting in the hearts of men and women the ideals of justice and humanity for which he fought and with the hope that these ideals may grow and bloom as flowers along the pathway of the discouraged and distressed, and thus bring hope, happiness, and joy, where otherwise would be despair, desolation, and failure.

These lectures are intended in a modest way to plant the seeds of Bronson Cutting's philosophy in the hearts of the people whom he loved, that they may bear fruit years after all those who now live have passed through the portals that separate humanity from eternity. We want to carry forward his doctrine, his philosophy of life, his ideas of government, in order to bring about a higher sense of justice, a greater comprehension of the duties we owe to our country, to our brethren, to ourselves, and to humanity.

The story of Bronson Cutting's life will lighten the burden of future generations by silently, perhaps unconsciously, but nevertheless forcefully and irresistibly influencing the hearts, the minds, and the souls of unborn generations. The modest, unassuming, but penetrating and courageous lesson of his life will become the strong, upholding influence of many a hand in the unseen future as it carries aloft the torch of justice and of freedom. Thus the influence of his life, the lessons it taught, the example it set, will become the guiding star that shall ever lead onward and upward.

Mr. HATCH. I also ask that there be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks, and not in the Appendix, certain editorials concerning the Bronson Cutting memorial which have appeared in newspapers throughout the country.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BRONSON CUTTING'S UNIQUE LIVING MEMORIAL—WASHINGTON AUDIENCE HEARS NORRIS PAY TRIBUTE TO FAMOUS PROGRESSIVE; DR. CHARLES A. BEARD, GREATEST OF AMERICAN HISTORIANS, AND MAYOR LAGUARDIA OPEN LECTURE COURSE

By Charles M. Kelley

Washington has erected many monuments, in bronze and marble, in honor of the great and near great, but there is none more significant than one dedicated this week to Senator Bronson Cutting, New Mexico progressive, who lost his life in an airplane crash 2 years ago.

As the Senator—a great Democrat—might have wished, his memory is to be kept green by a series of lectures each spring for 3 years on social and economic problems. The object is to create interest in and increased knowledge of fundamental problems which are pressing for solution. If the experiment works out as expected, it probably will be continued indefinitely.

GIFT OF DEVOTED MOTHER

This practical and living memorial was made possible by Mrs. W. Bayard Cutting, a devoted mother who shared the ideals and progressive convictions for which her talented son so valiantly fought.

The opening lecture attracted what Washington newspaper writers like to describe as a "distinguished" audience. Present were members of the Cabinet, United States Supreme Court, and diplomatic corps, and scores of Senators and Congressmen.

Even more important, there was a vast concourse of plain people who wished to pay homage to their champion. They turned out in such force that it was necessary to arrange an overflow meeting as large in numbers as the main audience.

DRAWN BY LOVE AND ESTEEM

This unprecedented testimonial was spontaneous and not the result of ballyhoo. There had been practically no publicity of the event. The Senator's friends and admirers needed no urging to show their love and esteem.

Senator Cutting was both a scholar and a man of action, and he was mightily troubled by the present-day assaults upon popular government here and abroad. It was therefore fitting that the opening lectures should be on subjects close to his heart.

DEMOCRACY CAN SURVIVE

Dr. Charles A. Beard, one of the Nation's outstanding historians, discussed Can Democracy Survive? To avoid any misunderstanding that pessimism was implied by that title, let it be stated that the answer was an emphatic "yes."

"Democracy in Action" was the theme of a magnificent speech by Fiorello A. LaGuardia, New York City's fighting liberal mayor.

Senator GEORGE W. NORRIS, veteran battler for progressive causes, paid a tribute to Senator Cutting's exceptional qualities as a man and as a far-seeing, bold, and courageous statesman.

"When Senator Cutting was cut down in the prime of his physical and mental powers," Senator NORRIS said, "struggling millions of the toilers lost a great leader, a brave defender, and an advocate who knew no fear." He added:

"A man of wealth, his great heart beat in unison with the downtrodden and oppressed, for those who toil for their daily bread. All along his pathway of life there are emblems of his charity, generosity, justice, and mercy."

Dr. Beard declared that Senator Cutting combatted efforts to whittle at the pillars of popular government and would have been the first to violently dissent from Mussolini's recent declaration that "Democracy is only a mask for capitalism."

ROOTED IN PLAIN PEOPLE

Democracy, Dr. Beard insisted, has its roots deep in the soul and aspirations of plain people.

"In England", he said, "democracy was advocated by obscure and humble persons called 'levelers' and thoroughly despised by the possessing classes. In these struggles we do not find either capitalists or landlords.

"This is also true of American history. Here the movement received its strength from farmers and industrial workers whose names do not loom large in history but who left us a priceless heritage.

"Descendants of those Americans, refusing to take at face value the old maxims of new upstarts, are determined to preserve democratic processes."

DEMOCRACY VERSUS DESPOTISM

Dr. Beard—as did Mayor LaGuardia—clearly had in mind the controversy over court reform when he asserted that democracy must be alive to changing conditions and have the courage to meet them, while despotisms, "under whatever name they masquerade", are efforts to freeze history, to stop change, to solidify and imprison the human spirit.

"There is only one way by which a despotism can be altered", he declared. "That is by revolution, by the kind of violence employed in its creation."

Declaring that democracy is dynamic, and that when it stops it either crumbles or changes its form, Mayor LaGuardia said it must be "alert, active, and moving forward all the time."

"When we hear people say that this or that was never intended by the founders of our Constitution", he continued, "we ask: How do they know? As a matter of fact, they know no more about it than the rest of us."

FATHERS DIDN'T KNOW

Contrasting the conditions with which the founding fathers were familiar with the complex problems of an intricate economic system, LaGuardia declared:

"The Constitution was as perfect a document as imperfect human beings could live under. But it could not provide for conditions that could not be foreseen—poverty, child labor, and other forms of exploitation.

"Without economic security, democracy cannot last very long. You can't talk patriotism to a man with a hungry family.

"Subtle forces can hold democracy back. It has been retarded by corrupt political machines, great abundance, and universal ignorance. We have gone all through those phases.

BLOCKED BY COURTS

"The fourth factor blocking the progress of democracy is the courts. Their fine distinctions were never intended by the Constitution or its framers. We cannot accept that situation.

"We cannot continue keeping millions on relief. Other problems demand adjustment and cannot be denied.

"We have the resources and the genius to eradicate poverty, and until that is done this country cannot be regarded as fit for true democracy."

[From the New Republic of Mar. 31, 1937]

Senator Bronson Cutting of New Mexico, who was killed in an airplane accident in May 1935, was one of the ablest of the group of American progressives. After his tragic death, a spontaneous movement arose among his friends for a memorial to him of a character appropriate to his qualities and outlook. The group hit upon the happy idea of a series of memorial lectures to be held in Washington. With the financial asistance of his mother, Mrs. W. Bayard Cutting, these are now under way and the overwhelming success thus far achieved demonstrates the value of the plan. Dr. Charles A. Beard, Mayor Fiorello LaGuardia, of New York, and Prof. Harold J. Laski are among the chief speakers already selected and others appearing at the early meetings were Senators George Norris and Robert La Follette and Edward F. McGrady, Assistant Secretary of Labor. Admission has been without charge but tickets had to be requested in advance. The response was so tremendous that it has been necessary to have each speech delivered twice, and even so, hundreds of applications for tickets have necessarily been rejected. This is the more remarkable since every professional lecture agent regards Washington, the fountainhead of political oratory, as one place where the inhabitants can't be dragged to a public lecture. In the audiences have been noted some 60 representatives of 17 embassies and legations, a thousand Government officials, Members of the House and Senate, and many students in Washington colleges. We can think of no finer memorial project for a man like Senator Cutting and we hope a precedent has been set that will be widely followed in other parts of the country.

[From the Washington Post of Mar. 26, 1937]

A WORTHY MEMORIAL

The large and enthusiastic attendance at the two stimulating lectures given by Prof. Harold J. Laski at Constitution Hall, coupled with the similar reception for the earlier address by Prof. Charles A. Beard, is convincing evidence of the wisdom of those who planned a Bronson Cutting memorial in the form of lectures.

For a city around which so much of the life of the Nation revolves, Washington has been rather conspicuously lacking in such forms of intellectual entertainment. Partly this is the natural reaction of a community drenched in professional oratory. Partly it is attributable to the fact that the local college communities are not yet the thoroughly integrated and dominant part of municipal life they form elsewhere. Whatever the cause, it is healthy that this new institution, like the Town Hall and other agencies, is breaking down the tradition that Washingtonians are apathetic to public discussion.

Mrs. W. Bayard Cutting, who made possible this living memorial to her famous son, has reason to be convinced of the wisdom of the belief that in this practical and constructive manner the life and spirit of a truly great American is best commemorated. The turn-out for this year's memorial lectures constituted a splendid tribute to Senator Cutting. And the speakers have happily exemplified the vigor and vitality of the democratic spirit to which he was so thoroughly devoted.

[From the Washington Daily News, Mar. 3, 1937]

THE CUTTING MEMORIAL

We can think of no more fitting memorial to the late Senator Bronson Cutting of New Mexico than the series of memorial lectures to be given in Washington each spring for the next 3 years. And the first topic, "Can Democracy Survive?" is one that the young statesman himself might have suggested. Dr. Charles A. Beard, scholar, and New York's Mayor Fiorello LaGuardia, man of action, will deliver the first two talks on this subject. Senator Cutting was both a scholar and a man of action, and he was mightily troubled by the present-day assaults upon popular self-government both here and abroad.

BRONSON CUTTING hated all of democracy's enemies—war, economic greed, demagogery, racial prejudice, and intolerance. He knew, with Walt Whitman, that, to survive, democracy must take the offensive. Better than any personal tribute in fine marble is this marshaling of Cutting's dreams and purposes and sending them into action.

REORGANIZATION OF FEDERAL JUDICIARY

[Mr. HOLT asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an address relative to the proposed reorganization of the Federal judiciary, delivered by himself at the University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, N. C., on Tuesday, Mar. 23, 1937, which appears in the Appendix.]

INDUSTRIAL DEMOCRACY AND INDUSTRIAL PEACE

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, because of the urgency of the labor problems now confronting the country, I feel justified in taking some time of the Senate for the presentation of my views upon the subject. As my views are the product of no little experience, and as the facts supporting them are extensive, I cannot be very brief.

THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN EMPLOYER AND WORKER: A GREAT NATIONAL PROBLEM

During 1935 and 1936 almost 2,000,000 American workers were involved in labor disputes. Considering that the average loss of employment was 15 days per man, nearly 30,000,000 idle days were substituted for productive days because of strikes. If we examine the first 2 months of the current year alone, we find that 200,000 men and women laid down their tools voluntarily and that 4,000,000 days of potentially creative effort were spent in industrial warfare.

The most disconcerting aspect of the economic strife of today is not its rising incidence, but rather its changing character. The strikes of today differ fundamentally from those of 10 years ago. They are more sudden in their inception, more drastic in their methods, and more violent in their repercussions. Above all, they are more electrifying and more contagious in their influence. The relationship between employer and employee has today become a great national problem.

The recognition that we are confronted by a Nation-wide problem demanding a national remedy has flashed with surprising suddenness upon the consciousness of the whole country. We know now that when men go on strike in persistently larger numbers domestic tranquillity is threatened. We know that when factories stop running, commerce stops flowing. The impact of hard fact is shattering the concept of a hair-splitting distinction between direct and indirect effects upon national commerce. As said by Mr. Justice Brandies, the logic of words is giving way to the logic of realities.

Nothing in the current situation has impressed me more than the recent statement of the National Association of Manufacturers, setting forth a plan for Federal intervention in labor disputes. I recall the vehement protestations of this organization when the National Labor Relations Act was before Congress on the ground that all dealings between employers and workers in manufacturing were of purely local concern. If they and others were right when they claimed that the National Labor Relations Act was unconstitutional in toto, then the Federal Government has no jurisdiction to do anything whatsoever about strife in industry. If they and others are now right when they clamor for Federal action in situations analogous to the General Motors conflict, then both they and the 53 Liberty League lawyers who pronounced the National Labor Relations Act unconstitutional in toto were wrong. I cannot infer that any responsible group of citizens would say that Federal intervention is constitutional in protection of what they believe to be their interests but unconstitutional to safeguard what they believe to be the interests of others. I gladly give the National Association of Manufacturers the benefit of every doubt. I presume they realize better than they did 2 years ago the national significance of justice and peace in all our Nation-wide industries.

All recent experience has shown us that there are two major ways of dealing with great national problems. When an army of the unemployed marched upon Washington 5 years ago, one way of meeting them was with bayonets and tear gas. The other way was to search for the underlying causes of Nation-wide unemployment and to seek to remove those causes by the application of a national remedy. When poverty-stricken farmers were seizing milk trucks by force and spilling their contents upon the road, one way to meet this problem was by swearing out warrants of arrest. The other way was to search for the underlying causes of the bankruptcy of agriculture and to seek to remove these Nation-wide causes by the application of a national remedy. When home owners with mortgages around their own necks were threatening to tie nooses around the necks of sheriffs seeking to evict them, one way of meeting this problem was to regard the home owner as a common intruder and evict him from the premises. The other way was to search for the underlying causes of Nation-wide bankruptcy and to seek to remove these causes by the application of a national remedy.

These two contrasting methods of dealing with discontent on the part of large portions of our people may be called, respectively, the do-and-die method and the reason-why method. I propose to apply the reason-why method to the rising tide of industrial unrest. I do not say that either the problems or the actions of the worker are in all respects analogous to those of the farmer, the home owner, or the unemployed. But I do say that they are problems equally penetrating in their roots and requiring equal vision and intelligence for their solution. Widespread conflict between industry and labor cannot be handled on the same plane as a dance hall brawl. Why does a man go on strike? Why are there more strikes now than there were before? What are the underlying causes for this Nation-wide condition, and how may we remove these causes by the application of a national remedy?

COLLECTIVE BARGAINING: THE FUNDAMENTAL RIGHT OF A FREE WORKER

Certain basic facts must ever be borne in mind as fundamental to this inquiry. The unemployed hunger marcher, the bankrupt farmer, and the distressed home owner were seeking only to limit or invade the so-called property rights of others, or to extend their own human and property rights. They were not voluntarily surrendering any of their own enjoyments or privileges. But the worker who goes on strike does more than that. He bears a self-inflicted wound. He damages his own property interest in his job. He cuts off, at least temporarily, his own pay envelope. He runs grave risk of never again obtaining the employment which supports his wife and family. He faces, in many instances, substantial physical danger. Without saying anything at this stage about the legality, justice, or wisdom of the sit-down strike, all these things are equally true whether the worker sits down in the plant or stands up outside the plant.

Anyone who understands human nature, and who has studied or observed the history of labor in America, knows that men in large numbers in widely separated places will not run these terrible risks for light and transient causes. No leader, no amount of propaganda, no degree of incitement, can stampede men into taking these risks if their sensibilities have not been repeatedly lacerated by causes which they believe to be deep and abiding. If strikes and other evidences of industrial discontent have become a common occurrence, the underlying cause is just this: Great masses of American workers feel frustrated in those aspirations which American society has taught them to regard as part of the common American heritage.

What is our common American heritage? We believe in individual initiative and reward corresponding to merit; but at the same time we are committed to the fair distribution of our wealth among the great masses of our citizens. We believe that every advance in science and technology should be translated, not into swollen private fortunes, but into greater leisure and comfort for all society. We believe that America has the material means and human energy to lift poverty from 10,000,000 American homes. We believe in political democracy as the form of government best devised to attain these ends; and we hold that political democracy will become a sham and a delusion unless there is economic democracy in industry itself.

For almost 100 years, our law and public opinion have both regarded the right of the worker to associate with his fellows and to bargain collectively as an essential part of this American heritage. Every step in the growth of large-scale industry has made this right less of an abstract ideal and more of a concrete practical necessity. The isolated worker today is a mere connection link in an impersonalized and heartless machine. He is powerless to defend himself against the occasional wrong of the corporation which controls him; and in the vast majority of the cases where the corporation wants to do what is right, the isolated worker is expressionless to convey to the management what his problems are. Effective contact between the two is physically impossible. That is why the right to bargain collectively is a necessary implement not only to social justice for the worker, but equally to the wise and rational conduct of business affairs. That is why the observance or denial of this right means the difference between democracy in industry on the one hand, and tyranny, or at best, benevolent despotism on the other. Today there is not a single responsible man in public life who would deny that the worker's industrial freedom must be preserved if we are to preserve the essence of liberty in America.

THE AMERICAN WORKER: LAW ABIDING DESPITE LEGAL ADVERSITY

How has the worker sought to preserve these rights? In historical perspective, faith in and obedience to law have always been characteristics of the American worker. He has believed that his industrial rights, once they received recognition from the Government, would be protected by the Government. He has believed that the development of new rights to meet new economic situations should be through the orderly processes of judicial pronouncement and statutory enactment. Practically every major statute of the past half century designed to redress social wrongs has received its inspiration and support from the masses of the common people. In historical perspective, the outstanding examples of organized circumvention of the law in America have never emanated from the common people.

Is there a change today? Have the millions of toilers lost faith in the capacity of law and government? Have these plain and honest people, who were always the first to honor the law, now become the last to respect it? Have the millions of workers who stood in the trench lines to protect America's safety, and who now stand in the human beltlines of our mass-production industries to create America's wealth, now forsaken the spirit of American institutions? I profoundly believe that this is not so. The facts prove beyond peradventure of doubt that it is not so.

Let us survey the significant events in labor's relationship to the law. That survey will set forth in bold relief the underlying causes for industrial discontent—causes which exist on a Nation-wide scale and require a national remedy.

The antitrust laws, beginning in 1890, marked the first attempt of contemporary significance to prevent entrenched wealth from gaining supreme power over the lives of the small-business man, the worker, and the consuming public. With high hopes labor hailed the enactment of this soundly conceived statute. With growing dismay labor witnessed its tragic demolition at the hands of the courts.

In one line of decisions the Supreme Court held that monopoly in manufacture did not affect interstate commerce, for which see United States v. E. C. Knight Company (156 U. S. 1 (1894)); that control by one corporation of 95 percent of the shoe-machinery business was beneficent and legal, for which see United Shoe Machinery Corporation v. United States (251 U. S. 417 (1920)); and that a so-called good trust was immune from the law, no matter how large, for which see United States v. International Harvester Company (274 U. S. 693 (1926)). Under the protective coloration of its "rule of reason" doctrine, the Court ruled out the clear intent of Congress and substituted the untrammeled rule of legislation by judiciary. For 40 years monopoly was smiled upon under the antitrust statutes as it had never been favored at common law before those statutes were passed.

In a second line of decisions running concurrently with the first, the Supreme Court seized the weapon aimed at predatory power and wielded it unstintingly against the common man. Injunction upon injunction cut short the struggles of men and women to obtain better hours or higher wages through collective action. Despite polite acceptance of the general theory of collective bargaining, peaceful picketing was held under certain conditions to be illegal. When Congress, through the Clayton Act, sought to curb the inequitable use of the injunction in equity the Court held in American Steel Foundry v. The Tri-City Central Trades Council, printed in 257 U. S. 184 (1921), that the Clayton Act was merely "declaratory" of the very decisions it had been enacted to overrule. Finally, the time came when from the liberal wing of the Supreme Court itself there was issued this indignant note of protest:

> It was urged that the real motive in seeking the injunction was not ordinarily to prevent property from being injured, nor to protect the owner in its use, but to endow property with active militant power, which would make it dominant over men. In other words, that under the guise of protecting property rights the employer was seeking sovereign power.

I have just read from the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Brandeis in Truax v. Corrigan (257 U. S. 312 (1921)).

Labor patiently observed these decisions, distorted though they were. For 7 long years labor devoted itself to the advocacy of the Norris-La Guardia Anti-Injunction Act. That splendid statute stands today as an ineffaceable declaration of the public policy of the United States.

But the struggle for industrial liberty was only just begun. Denied improper entry into the Federal courts, the anti-union cohorts shifted their efforts to the State courts. Here they were successful in rearing a second barricade against the workers' march to freedom.

A very recent case is illustrative of the lengths to which the inferior courts have commonly gone. It prohibited even the selling or giving away of a newspaper presenting the workers' side of an industrial controversy. I call attention to Thrifty Drug Stores, Inc., against Los Angeles Pharmacists' Union, Local 840, et al., in the Superior Court of Los Angeles County, no. 409906, cited in the International Juridical Association Monthly Bulletin for January 1937, at page 3.

These adverse decisions in local ccurts the workers of America bore with a patient shrug. They awaited another opportunity to embody their unrecognized rights in an enforceable code of law. That opportunity came when, as a product of a decade of experience, struggle, and disaster, the famous section 7 (a) was written into the National Industrial Recovery Act. The wisdom of many portions of that act is now the subject of controversy and doubt. But if the only question before Congress today were whether the principles of section 7 (a) should be the law of the land, it would be approved more overwhelmingly than in 1933.

No statute of Congress was ever flouted with greater impunity than section 7 (a). Misconstrued by its friends and misrepresented by its enemies, dishonored by the courts, lacking the teeth of adequate enforcement provisions, section 7 (a) was immediately reduced to a ghostlike unreality, haunting the worker with its promise of fair treatment, and disappearing from his grasp when he sought to avail himself of it.

What were the consequences? By the end of 1934, as we all recall, industrial combination had become so disproportionately strong that economic unbalance again threatened the Nation. While pay rolls stood at only 59 percent of normal, dividends had risen to 149 percent. Warfare raged in the automobile industry, on the west coast, and elsewhere throughout the land. As 1935 moved forward, hostilities seemed imminent in many major industries. Under the compulsion of this national crisis the National Labor Relations Act was passed.

THE NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS ACT—ITS ESSENTIAL WORKABILITY

The provisions of the National Labor Relations Act are surprisingly simple. It restates the time-honored doctrine that the worker shall be free to join or refrain from joining a union. It forbids the employer from discriminating against the worker for exercising this freedom of choice. It outlaws the dummy union financed and dominated by the company. It provides for majority rule in the choice of representatives, and it empowers the Labor Board to hold elections to determine which representatives the majority prefer. It imposes the duty to recognize the practice of collective bargaining. Finally, it makes every order of the Board subject to complete review in the Federal courts.

These provisions were not pulled out of thin air. For years they had all been tested by the Railway Labor Board and other Government agencies. Long experience in the transportation industry had proved conclusively that bitter and prolonged conflicts arose almost entirely from the denial of the right to bargain collectively, and that where that fundamental right was guaranteed, the settlement of other questions was feasible without public intervention, through the mutual efforts of industry and labor. The very recent solution of the thorny problem of employment rights in connection with railway consolidation, and the amicable agreement upon the subject of railway pensions, illustrate that between friends and equals strife is rarely necessary.

The history of the National Labor Relations Board substantiates this view. The substantive scope of the statute has never been found inadequate where the Board's powers have been recognized. An outstanding example is the very recent case involving a plant of the General Electric Company located at Schenectady, N. Y. A dispute arose between an outside union and a plant union as to which represented the majority of the workers. By common consent and with the cooperation of the management, the Board held a secret election on company property during working hours. The outside union won by the vote of 5,111 to 4,033. Despite this close vote all the parties at once recognized the right of the majority union to represent all, and the minority union yielded amicably. Thus the reasonable solution offered by the Labor Relations Act triumphed over the alternative recourse to trial by combat, with its prospect of certain hatred and possible bloodshed.

COMPANY UNIONS BREED NATION-WIDE INDUSTRIAL DISCONTENT

Contrast this happy disposition of a difficult situation with the case involving the Pennsylvania Greyhound lines. As soon as section 7 (a) was enacted, this mammoth transportation agency formulated its company-dominated union plan. The general manager of maintenance circulated the following letter among his subordinates:

> The management has decided to set up a plan of employee representation. * * * Before the plan can be set up the management must be requested by the employees of the various divisions to do so. * * * It is to our interest to pick out employees to serve on the committee who will work for the interest of the company and will not be radical. This plan of representation should work out very well, provided that the proper men are selected.

Pursuant to this disingenuous plan for helping their men get organized, the management wrote the constitution for the men; the management provided that the constitution could not be amended without its consent; the management stipulated that the representatives selected by the men must necessarily be in the employ of the company, and therefore not have the economic independence which the independent spokesman needs.

Shocked by this mockery flaunted in their faces, some of the employees did the only thing that bold and resolute men could be expected to do—they joined an outside union. Immediately they were told by their foreman that "the Greyhound has plenty of money and will stop at nothing to break your union." Following this their attendance at union meetings was spied upon by undercover men given special employment for that purpose. Finally a number of employees, all of whom had previously been threatened or warned about their union activities, were discharged on that account.

The union did not call a strike. Patiently and trustingly it submitted the case to the National Labor Relations Board, as reported on the first page of the first volume of the Board's decisions, 1935. In December 1935 the Board sought enforcement of the law in the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Third Judicial Circuit. After 15 months the court has done nothing.

Mr. President, the case I have just cited does not represent the labor policy of a small and obscure concern. The Greyhound system boasts that it "serves more millions of people, more territory, more cities, and national playgrounds than any other travel system in the United States." Certainly a strike in this vast network would be of Nation-wide concern. And yet, the employees of this great transportation industry have in effect been told that they have no legal redress whatsoever against wrongs which the National Labor Relations Act of Congress for 2 years has covered specifically and in full—wrongs which will eventually drive them to a strike of national significance if they are not redressed.

COMPANY VIOLENCE AND INTIMIDATION FOMENT NATION-WIDE INDUSTRIAL DISCONTENT

Mr. President, no fair-minded lawyer will deny, particularly after the decision 2 days ago by the Supreme Court in the Virginia Railway case, that where the employees are themselves engaged in interstate commerce the National Labor Relations Act may be validly applied. The fundamental principles of this law have, in fact already been affirmed generally by the lower courts. But that is not the whole picture. The devastating burdens upon interstate commerce which have come to national attention in recent weeks have arisen from industrial strife in our great mass-production industries. Let us examine some instances of these cases and see how the Board's work has been crippled in the courts.

In 1934 the employees of the Jones & Laughlin Steel Corporation took seriously the pledge of the Government that they would be allowed to organize and bargain collectively. Many of them joined a lodge of the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel, and Tin Workers. At once they were subjected by the corporation to a veritable reign of terror. The more important union officers were hounded by permanent shadows. The home of the union's financial secretary, at which an organizational meeting had been held, was surrounded day and night by the Jones & Laughlin private police. It became impossible for the men to exercise their constitutional right of assembly until complaint had been made to the Governor and State police sent in.

The corporation made no bones of its position. Every economic strangle hold known to the company town was applied. Employees were told that if they continued their union affiliations the corporation would evict them for the slightest delinquency in rent and that local merchants would not extend them credit. Finally, in July 1935, the union's president and vice president were discharged, and thereafter a number of other union members met the same fate.

There was no strike. Patiently and trustingly the case was submitted to the National Labor Relations Board, which found that 10 discharges were in violation of the act. The holding of the Board is printed on page 503 of the first volume of its decisions, 1936. The order of the Board was referred for enforcement to the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fifth Judicial Circuit. The court had before it the opinion of Mr. Justice Sutherland in the Carter coal case, decided just 1 month before and embodied in Two Hundred and Ninety-eighth United States Reports at page 238. In that tremendously important case Mr. Justice Sutherland said:

> Much stress is put upon the evils which come from the struggle between employers and employees over the matter of wages, working conditions, the right of collective bargaining, etc., and the resulting strikes, curtailment and irregularity of production, and effect on prices; and it is insisted that interstate commerce is greatly affected thereby. * * * The relation of employer and employee is a local relation. At common law it is one of the domestic relations. The controversies and evils, which it is the object of the act to regulate and minimize, are local controversies and evils affecting local work undertaken to accomplish the local result. Such effect as they may have upon commerce, however extensive it may be, is secondary and indirect. An increase in the greatness of the effect adds to its importance. It does not alter its character.

Upon the authority of this decision the circuit court held that the Federal Government had no jurisdiction whatsoever over the labor relations of the Jones & Laughlin Co. For this case see Eighty-third Federal Reports, second, at page 998. The case is now awaiting decision by the Supreme Court. Two years after enactment the National Labor Relations Act is still not the law of the land with respect to the great steel industry.

Mr. President, the Jones & Laughlin Steel Corporation is not a small and obscure concern. It ranks fourth in the production of steel in the United States. It has manufacturing plants in Pennsylvania, mines in Minnesota, fabricating shops in New Orleans, boats on the Great Lakes, and sales offices in 20 cities throughout the United States. Who can say, in the light of recent developments, that a strike in such an industry would not be a matter of Nation-wide concern? Who can agree with Mr. Justice Sutherland that the size has nothing to do with the case? And yet, for all practical purposes, the employees of the Jones & Laughlin Corporation have been told that they have no national remedy against wrongs covered specifically and in full for the past 2 years by the National Labor Relations Act of Congress—wrongs which will eventually drive them to a strike of national significance if they are not redressed.

COMPANY SPIES AND ESPIONAGE PROVOKE NATION-WIDE INDUSTRIAL DISCONTENT

Early in 1934 the Fruehauf Trailer Company, manufacturing automobile trailers in Detroit, decided on its own motion that its employees ought not to belong to the United Automobile Workers, a Federal Labor Union affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. The company did not consult the views of Congress that the worker should make his own decision. Consequently, the management hired from the very helpful Pinkerton Detective Agency a secret operative, whose duty it was to ferret out the union activities of the men and keep the boss informed. Posing as an employee of the plant, this spy gained the union's confidence, was admitted to its membership, and eventually became its trusted treasurer. Several times each week he supplied the management with lucid reports of the union meetings, which were burned after they were read. In addition, he furnished to the company's officials lists of the union membership; and from time to time these officials circulated throughout the factory with these lists in their hands, warning their employees against union activities. The double-crossing detective carried his deception so far as to solicit and "sign up" members for the union during working hours.

Completely armed with the ill-gotten information, the management summarily discharged nine men because of their union activities. This included all the officers of the union except, strange to relate, its trusted treasurer. The company atoned fully for its prior deception in employing the Pinkerton men. It was brutally frank in telling all the discharged men that they were fired for daring to enter the union. When these sordid details became generally known, suspicion, unrest, and confusion were rife within the plant.

The union did not go on a strike. Patiently and trustingly it referred the case to the National Labor Relations Board, whose decision and order are contained in the first volume of the Board's decisions, 1935, at page 68. The order of the Board was referred to the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Sixth Judicial Circuit, and was held to be unenforcibly on June 30, 1936, for which see Eighty-five Federal, second, at page 391. The court felt that it was bound by Mr. Justice Sutherland's opinion in the Carter coal case that—

> The evils which come from the struggle between employers and employees over * * * the right of collective bargaining, and the resulting strikes * * * are local controversies and evils.

Realism gave way to legalism. The Fruehauf case is now in the Supreme Court. Two years after enactment, the National Labor Relations Act is still no more effective than a scrap of paper with respect to the great automobile industry.

Mr. President, the Fruehauf Trailer Company is not a small or obscure concern. It is the largest enterprise in the United States engaged in the manufacture, assembly, and distribution of automobile trailers for commercial purposes. The evidence is simply overwhelming that its practices have been typical of the practices prevailing throughout the area where it is located, namely, the automobile area. Who will agree, under conditions as they are today, that a strike in this vast company would not be a matter of grave national importance? Who will agree with Mr. Justice Sutherland that the relation of employer and employee, like the domestic relation, is purely of local concern? Yet here are the employees of this great Nation-wide industry suffering from malpractices which the National Labor Relations Act, passed 2 years ago by Congress and signed by the President, covers specifically and in full; and yet these same workers for all practical purposes have no remedy against the wrongs done them—wrongs which will inevitably drive them to a nationally significant strike if they are not redressed.

SYSTEMATIC SUPPRESSION OF THE WORKERS' RIGHT TO BARGAIN COLLECTIVELY—THE UNDERLYING CAUSE FOR NATION-WIDE INDUSTRIAL DISCONTENT

The Fruehauf case, involving as it does automobile trailers, provides background for an understanding of the General Motors controversy. It is illustrative of the commonly known fact that for years our largest mass-production industries have paid only the barest lip service to the principles of industrial democracy. It adds conclusive weight to the statement by Governor Murphy, of Michigan, made this very year concerning the "historic opposition in this area to any organization of any kind."

This "historic opposition to any organization of any kind" characterized the traditional labor policies of the General Motors Corporation. As late as March 15, 1934, at a hearing before the National Labor Board, the forerunner of the present Board, Mr. W. S. Knudson said:

> We have no right to bargain with the Labor Board in respect to how our employees may choose to be represented, and must decline to make any commitment or accept any obligation with respect to any election that may be resorted to.

Thus early did the General Motors Corporation register its predetermined defiance of any order or election of any agency of the Federal Government which might be based upon the law rather than upon the voluntary consent of the company. That position was maintained toward the National Labor Relations Board throughout the recent crisis. So far as anyone can tell, it is still maintained today.

In 1933, when section 7 (a) became law, the General Motors Corporation proceeded to set up a ramifying system of company-dominated unions throughout its plants. These unions, in all their essential features, were quite as completely the marionettes of the employer as the stuffed dummies of the Greyhound Co. One rather unique feature of the Michigan variety was that in case of any disagreement at a collective-bargaining conference between employer and employee representatives, the whole matter should be referred for settlement to the "central office of the Fisher Body Corporation in Detroit." In other words, after the stage play of collective bargaining to give the appearance of law observance, the curtain was rung down and the employer alone was to "settle" all differences behind the scenes.

Certainly American workers could not have been expected forever to tolerate such impostures. It was only natural that, under the lash of treatment received, they entered the organizations of their own choice and relied upon the protection of the law. But when they did so, the corporation introduced an elaborate network of Pinkerton spies, and extended this network until G. M. C. became the detective agency's best customer. These spies shadowed and tapped the wires of union leaders, union meetings, and Federal mediators indiscriminately. They masqueraded so cleverly as hard-working laborers that they were elected to all of the five offices in the Lansing local. The conscientious manner in which they addressed themselves to their honorable posts as union officials soon reduced the membership in the local from 100 percent of the employees in the plant to zero. When the resolution was passed by Congress for the La Follette investigation, General Motors destroyed the damaging record of its labor espionage.

On top of these injuries, the General Motors Corporation repeatedly refused to bargain collectively with the representatives of any independent union except through the managers of its local plants. Since these managers had no authority whatsoever except to report tentative results to the real powers of the corporation for ratification, the proposal amounted to the same fictitious negotiations that had been practiced by the old company unions. After the stage play of free bargaining was over, the employer was to decide the case in camera. Having endured these conditions for many years, the men went on strike.

THE NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD—AN AGENCY FOR PEACE AND JUSTICE STRIPPED OF ITS POWERS BY THE COURTS

How was the National Labor Relations Board prevented from coping with the General Motors crisis? Long before the General Motors strike commenced the Board started, upon widespread complaint, an investigation of industrial practices in that industry. But when in June 1936 the Board sought to conduct a preliminary hearing in the St. Louis area, where some of the General Motors plants were located, it was tied up by a temporary injunction in the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit, issued on July 6, 1936. The court did not wait to find out whether the facts revealed by the Board would indicate an impending strike. The court enjoined the Board from even trying to get the facts. And this injunction suit was filed by the General Motors Corporation itself.

When the General Motors strike came the Board filed a petition asking that the injunction be lifted. This petition said in part:

> In view of the present emergency situation and the occurrence of the stoppage of interstate commerce which the National Labor Relations Board sought in June to avoid, all of which has occurred since the order of this court staying the Board from proceeding under the National Labor Relations Act, it is submitted that every consideration of equity, as well as of paramount public interest, indicates that the stay herein should be vacated and the National Labor Relations Board allowed to administer the applicable law of the United States.

The Board's petition was denied by the court.

Such was the Board's inability to act in the Eighth Circuit, where some of the General Motors plants were located. In the Sixth Circuit, where the Flint plant involved directly in the strike was situated, the Board had staring it in the face at the time of the strike the decision of the Circuit Court in the Fruehauf case, decided only a few months previously, and cited above. That decision, as I have said, held categorically that the Federal Government had no jurisdiction over automobile workers, on the authority of Mr. Justice Sutherland's opinion in the Carter coal case that both the employment relationship and strikes flowing from it were matters of local concern.

Mr. President, I seek to propound these questions: Could workers, having public knowledge of these two decisions against the Board's power to act, reasonably expect the Board to help them in the very jurisdictions where these decisions were the law? Could General Motors in the hour of danger expect help from the law, when in the hour of supposed safety it had joined with others in paralyzing the effectiveness of the law through court action? Could the Board itself, in any good conscience, assume the tremendous responsibility of injecting itself into a delicate strike situation, when it knew that under the circuit court decisions and the attitude of the company, it would take at least 2 years, even in the event of a favorable decision when the case finally arrived in the Supreme Court, to enforce any finding or order or decision that the Board might make? And so the Board was forced by the courts to stand by idly during 44 perilous days of bitterness and danger and economic loss, while at the same time the counsel of another great automobile company, the Fruehauf Company, was arguing in the Supreme Court that industrial relations in manufacturing were purely of local concern.

Certain definite conclusions force themselves upon every fair mind as a result of studying the General Motors situation. Here raged a great industrial conflict, dangerous to the community and painful to the Nation. Here was the 2-year-old National Labor Relations Act of Congress. The Act outlawed the vicious practices which by their repetition brought on the crisis. If it had been obeyed from its inception, there would have been no crisis. The Acts also contained the mechanism by which to avert the calamity even after the crisis arose. But because the courts had permitted the Act to be disobeyed, and would not allow it to be enforced, industry, labor, and the general public paid the price. And when the peace finally came, it embraced the very principles of decent industrial relations and collective bargaining that are embodied in the Act. What greater proof could there be of the soundness of the National Labor Relations Act?

The General Motors' workers found that by striking they could secure those industrial liberties which neither they nor other workers were able to get by recourse to the law. Do we want that kind of a lesson uppermost in the minds of over 20,000,000 working families? Or do we want them to be sure that the National Labor Relations Act will be so interpreted in the courts that it will provide a peaceful remedy for the settlement of controversies which disrupt the commerce of the Nation?

In the present Chrysler controversy, there is only a single issue—whether the United Automobile Workers of America, which represents by universal agreement more than 90 percent of the employees concerned, is entitled to be the sole bargaining agency for them all in the appropriate unit concerned. The National Labor Relations Act contains the complete answer to that question in its provision for majority rule, a rule applied successfully by the War Labor Board 20 years ago, as well as under the Railway Labor Act, and consistently reaffirmed by Congress on the basis of plentiful experience, and upheld by the Supreme Court 2 days ago in the Virginian Railway case.

Because the Board could not act in the Chrysler case—for the same reasons of court interference that it could not act in the General Motors strike—the war came. Can anyone say, in the face of the present facts, that the Chrysler strike does not concern the Nation? Do we not all know that the closing of motor plants in Michigan has caused closing of interdependent plants in other States? Is it not a shame that this huge company should be able to perpetuate and aggravate the controversy by refusing absolutely to accept the majority rule—a rule which our highest court 2 days ago said was not only constitutional, but also fair and conducive to industrial peace? Is it not clear that the only way to avoid industrial strife is to have the 2-year-old National Labor Relations Act of Congress so interpreted in the courts that its healing provision for majority rule, and its other salutary provisions, may be applied on a Nation-wide scale to the promotion of industrial peace?

These examples are typical. The latest figures of the Bureau of Labor Statistics show that, in terms of workers involved, 70 percent of all strike situations flow from the issue of collective bargaining rather than wages or hours. Make men free, and they will be able to negotiate without fighting.

ECONOMIC TRENDS TODAY—THE CHALLENGE TO WORKERS' SECURITY

Mr. President, all these cases, dramatic though they may be, disturbing though they are, are merely superficial and external compared to the deep-moving undercurrent of our economic life. What are these economic tendencies today? What is there in them which makes the worker's problems so serious, which makes him struggle so desperately for the preservation of the liberties which democratic government offers him for their solution?

First and foremost, there is the problem of technological change, the age-old clash between man and the machine. The present century has multiplied the rate of scientific progress beyond the wildest dreams of earlier fancy. To take a few common examples, in the boot and shoe industry two men can turn out the work that three were required for in 1920; in slaughtering and meat packing, three can accomplish today what five could do 17 years ago; and in the production of rubber tires and tubes, the single worker's output has doubled during the same lapse of time. The depression, by placing additional emphasis upon the reduction of costs, has accelerated even further the rate of change. In the short period since 1929, the effectiveness of the individual anthracite coal miner has risen by 17 percent; the output of the individual worker in the electric-power industry has mounted by 32 percent; and if we take industry as a whole, it is estimated that four men today can accomplish as much as five men in 1929.

Machinery has always offered two alternative prospects to the worker. Placed at the services of the masses of the people, it opens the way to unlimited plenty and social security. If made an instrument for the exploitation of the masses, it means deep human suffering accompanied by an unchallenged and irresponsible plutocracy.

Which of these two alternatives is to prevail in America rests upon equality of bargaining power. It is very easy to mistake the volume of talk for the volume of accomplishment. It is easy to fall into the delusion, because of much discussion and a few dramatic experiences, that the monopoly of capital has been succeeded by a monopoly of labor. Let us look at the facts. They will demonstrate.

An ideal illustration is afforded by the tobacco industry, which is manned largely by unorganized workers. Nineteen hundred and thirty-six was, indeed, a banner year for the industry. The annual return on invested capital surpassed that of 1929. Profits increased by 26 percent over those of 1935. At the present rate, 153,000,000 cigars and cigarettes are being manufactured annually for every 100,000,000 that were made each year in the period 1923–25. But, despite this huge increase of 53 percent in production, there are only 61 workers in the industry for every 100 employed in that earlier period. Has the employed tobacco worker of today benefited by this amazing technological advance? On the contrary, the average full-time employee is receiving a wage 20 percent below the 1923–25 level. Has the consumer benefited? On the contrary, he is paying the same old price for his smoke or a little more. Who has gained? The owners, and the owners alone.

Let us turn next to the iron and steel industry, which until the present year has been notoriously antiunion. Last year steel prices hit a 10-year high. Profits rose from $52,000,000 in 1935 to $152,000,000 in 1936, representing a gain of 191 percent. The rate of annual return on invested capital tripled within 12 months. But during this same glorious year 1936, the individual worker in the steel industry received not a single penny of increase in his hourly wage. He got a 14 percent increase in his full-time weekly wage, compared with the 191 percent increase in profits, but he "paid through the nose" for this slender increase by the addition of 5 full hours to his workweek. Even today, after the effective application of the new wage and hour agreement of March 2, 1937, the total volume of goods produced by the steel industry is 36 percent above the 1923–25 level, while employment is only 3 percent and wages are only approximately 13 percent above that level. The widening gulf between production and purchasing power is glaringly apparent.

Judged by profits alone, the wearing apparel industry is also glowing with prosperity. Its earnings in 1936 were greater than those of 1935 by 43 percent. The rate of return on invested capital arose from 6.3 to 9.6 percent annually. But what has been the individual worker's share of this gain? Two hours more were added to his workweek in 1936, making an added burden of 5 hours since the end of the N. R. A. In return for this added effort his weekly wage during 1936 increased by the munificent sum of 18 cents. His hourly wage was actually reduced. While the total volume of wage payments in the industry is barely at the 1923–25 level, the volume of goods produced is 34 percent above that level. These are figures, Mr. President, not conjectures. Cigarettes, steel, textiles, everywhere the same story, varying in degree alone.

Everyone is aware that the past year smashed all records in the automobile industry. The annual yield on invested capital reached the incredible figure of 26 percent, shooting beyond the 1929 mark. Profits rose from $199,000,000 in 1935 to $301,000,000 in 1936, a gain of 51 percent. So far as the ownership was concerned, 1936 in the automobile industry made 1929 look sick. But if we look at the individual worker's side of the picture we find that his full-time wage was 12 percent lower in 1936 than in 1929. Twelve dollars per year subtracted from every $100 per year that he had earned in the old prosperity era was his tax contribution toward the "new prosperity" of the industry. And for good measure the automobile worker today is working 4½ hours a week longer than he did in the days of the N. R. A. Do these figures indicate the imminence of a "labor monopoly"?

These key industries are indexes of general conditions. While industrial production is now running at 17 percent above the 1923–25 level, factory pay rolls are lagging at 5 percent below that level. While the profits of 940 representative industrial corporations increased 51 percent in 1936 over 1935, factory pay rolls rose less than 16 percent, factory employment less than 7 percent, and the per capita earnings of the individual factory worker on full time less than 8 percent. Standard Statistics estimate another 50 percent rise in the profits of these representative concerns during the first quarter of 1937.

Once again, as in the hectic period between 1922 and 1929, profits are running far ahead of production. Comparing 1933 with 1934, industrial production rose 4 percent and the profits of these 940 representative concerns rose 64 percent. Comparing 1934 with 1935, industrial production rose 14 percent and these profits mounted 50 percent. Comparing 1935 with 1936, as I have said, industrial production rose 17 percent and these profits soared 51 percent. In short, production is lagging behind profits because consumer income is too low and prices too high for more goods to be sold. Because there is no ready market for more production, there is no adequate stimulus to the reinvestment of profits in industry. Excess profits thus become frozen surpluses. And that is the sure road to depression.

THE TECHNIQUES OF INDUSTRIAL CONFLICT—WHO VIOLATES THE LAW

In summation, what is the situation today? The worker sees his fair share in the products of industry denied as it has been in the past by the greed of monopoly capital. He finds his hours growing longer while millions remain unemployed. He visualizes the horrors of another depression brought on by these distortions in our economy. He observes his right to organize and bargain collectively—his only salvation in a modern economic world—trampled upon. Under these circumstances, strikes have occurred.

In some of these strikes, the sit-down technique has evolved, as mass picketing and other techniques evolved in the past. Whether or not a particular technique is wise or foolish as a matter of pure industrial policy is not for me to say. What techniques will be approved by the law of the future no man in the world can say. I believe that today everyone should obey the law of today; and it is for each jurisdiction to say what the law is within its boundaries. I advocate obedience to law and court orders and court decisions by all people, everywhere, at all times. But in the current situation these all-important facts stand out above all others: The sit-down has been used only in protest against repeated violations of industrial liberties which Congress has recognized. The sit-down, even in the few cases where labor has used it effectively, has succeeded in winning for labor only such industrial liberties as both law and morals have long sanctioned. The sit-down has been provoked by the long-standing ruthless tactics of a few great corporations who have hamstrung the National Labor Relations Board by invoking court actions, which they have a perfect legal right to do; who have openly banded together to defy this law of Congress quite independently of any court action, which they have neither the legal nor the moral right to do; and who have systematically used spies and discharges and violence and terrorism to shatter the workers' liberties as defined by Congress, which they have neither the legal nor the moral right to do. The organized and calculated and cold-blooded sit-down against Federal law has come, as always, not from the common people, but from a few great vested interests. The uprising of the common people has come, as always, only because of a break-down in the ability of the law and our economic system to protect their rights.

Under these circumstances any narrow and overlegalistic discussion of property rights which neglects the human and social considerations involved is a short-sighted discussion. I believe in the institution of private property and want to see it preserved. It is the best system. But let me call attention to the words of Mr. Justice Holmes, uttered in an opinion which is pertinent here because it was a dissent against the misuse of the injunction against the right of working people. That great American said, in Truax against Corrigan, to which I have referred:

> Delusive exactness is a source of fallacy throughout the law. * * * An established business no doubt may have pecuniary value and commonly is protected by law against various unjustified injuries. But you cannot give it definiteness of contour by calling it a thing. It is a course of conduct and, like other conduct, is subject to substantial modification according to time and circumstances both in itself and in regard to what shall justify doing it a harm.

The industrial warfare of today is the result of a long course of conduct in the history of American industrial enterprise. Two wrongs never make a right. But all wise government consists in determining which evil is the underlying cause and which the effect. Deal only with the effect, attempt to force the effect underground, and the underlying causes are fertilized and multiplied. Deal with the underlying causes and the evil effects disappear. The National Labor Relations Act is directed against the proved causes of Nation-wide industrial conflict. Let the Federal Government have the power and the determination to enforce that law on a national scale and the Nation-wide conflict will subside.

THE REMEDY FOR INDUSTRIAL DISCONTENT: NOT NEW LEGISLATION BUT, RATHER, LAW ENFORCEMENT

On all sides there is talk of additional Federal legislation. It is relevant, under the circumstances, to inquire what type of legislation might be needed.

Is it proposed to remedy the often alleged "one-sidedness" of the National Labor Relations Act by giving employers substantive rights equivalent to those which workers are accorded under that Act?

Have not employers already made manifest their right to organize and bargain collectively through monster corporations and Nation-wide networks of trade associations? Have not employers secured their right to choose their own representatives absolutely free from interference by workers? Have not employers the right to apply the principle of majority rule to their corporate affairs, and to the selection of their spokesmen for purposes of dealing with their workers? If these questions sound hollow, it is only because the rights for which labor is now struggling so desperately have been exercised by business for so long that they are taken for granted.

Is it proposed to afford the employer legal remedies similar to those which labor is accorded under the National Labor Relations Act?

Labor's only remedy under the act is to receive injunctive relief in the Federal courts against violations of the right to bargain collectively, wherever that violation affects interstate commerce. Is there not a plentitude of power in these same Federal courts, except for the abuse of the injunction prohibited by the Norris-LaGuardia Act, to enjoin strikes and strike practices interfering with interstate commerce? Is not the injunctive remedy ever open to employers in the State courts? Is not the police power of the several States available to meet force with force, and violence with violence, in the protection of the property rights of the employer, as well as the human rights of the worker? And in whose behalf has this force of the State been most commonly invoked?

Those who insist upon immediate new forms of Federal action or legislation, therefore, are too likely to have in mind, not new power through court orders, but rather new power through physical force. They are likely to have in mind the throwing of Federal troops into the scales of labor controversy. Should this Federal force be used against employees who are striking because the National Labor Relations Act is violated? Should this Federal force be used against employers whose violation of the law of Congress lies at the root of the trouble? The answer is that this type of Federal force should not be used at all.

Mr. President, new legislation is never a remedy for the disobedience of existing law. The lack of power in the Federal Government to enforce the National Labor Relations Act today, and not any weakness in existing law, is the root cause of the present economic warfare. Let the Federal Government have the power and the determination to enforce that law on a Nation-wide scale, and we shall have on a Nation-wide scale the methods of justice and peace.

Two years ago, when the National Labor Relations Act was before Congress, I said, and my words can be found on page 37 of the hearings on S. 1958, Seventy-fourth Congress:

> If we allow section 7 (a) to languish we shall be confronted by intermittent periods of peace at the price of economic liberties, dangerous industrial warfare, and dire depression.

I was not an idle prophet then. I make the same prediction today. Let us not be detoured from the correct course by unessentials. There is no short-cut to the solution of great problems. Let us make the National Labor Relations Act in truth the law of the land. Let us follow consistently the only path which leads to industrial peace and economic justice for industry, labor, and the general public.

TRANSFER OF FRENCH ISLANDS IN ST. LAWRENCE RIVER AS CREDIT ON THE FOREIGN DEBTS

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, it seems almost profanation to intrude a foreign subject into that which has been presented with such sagacity, strategy, and eloquence by the able Senator from the State of New York [Mr. WAGNER]. The subject matter of his address may well make its appeal to the spirit of the times, and national consciousness will confess that the suggestions tendered and remedies suggested afford in themselves a complete solution that should be satisfactory and compensating to all those interested.

I join my able friend the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], who has just expressed commendation of this splendid utterance on the part of the able Senator from New York—this Senator from New York who is ever the voice of the rights of toilers.

But, Mr. President, I am permitted by the able Senators in charge of the coal bill—the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. GUFFEY]—to inject my intended observations at this moment, prior to the consideration of their bill. I express both my admiration and my sense of gratitude to both Senators.

I rise, Mr. President, with the indulgence of this honorable body, which has so often beyond my deserts allowed me to entertain it on subjects that may be said to be oftentimes wholly foreign to the discussion before the body. I am moved to bring to the attention of this day's session, for one or two moments, what I feel is worthy of serious consideration. The basis affording this discussion springs forth this morning. It is only on this late day brought to my attention. I announce that the information justifies me in presenting at this moment the subject and recommendation to those who will find some interest in the revelation.

Mr. President, I have often, and perchance at the irritation of the patience of this honorable body, made reference to the debts to the United States of various foreign countries. As to this, I have asserted, and with the aid of eminent Senators on this floor proven, not only the refusal of the debtors to pay but recalled their constant declination even to recognize the honorable obligation they bear this United States, and to observe that never comes an expression of appreciation from the debtors, and equally never a voice of gratitude on the part of the debtors. Today I desire to say a word that gives some little opportunity to one or two of these great debtors to make a gesture, at least, of honest faith, if payment or adjustment is to be carried out at any time.

Mr. President, we know that there is a treaty pending this morning in aid of trade to France, and one which France tenders as service to us. These treaties have for their purpose the exchange of trade—something, sir, that will bring from each to the other that which it is assumed will lead to profit in the future of what we speak of as commerce; nothing as tender of payment of debt in friendship.

Mr. President, the literary scholars around me recall the interesting dialogue between Shylock and Bassanio. When the request is made by Bassanio that Shylock dine with himself and Antonio, and Antonio seeks to be a debtor of Shylock, we have the following reply in refusing the invitation to dine with Antonio or Bassanio:

> I will buy with you, sell with you, talk with you, walk with you, and so following, but I will not eat with you, drink with you, nor pray with you.

Here we have a situation where these debtors are willing to buy with us and sell with us, but nothing will they do that will join in a prayer with us for some continuous peace and a degree of human accompaniment of justice between these nations.

Mr. President, there are two islands in the St. Lawrence River, approximately at the shore of the United States of America. These islands are known as St. Pierre and Miquelon. These islands are separate governments, so far as local government organization can define a government as separate, from that either of Canada or of France, though they nevertheless are owned by France, and are allowed to conduct their affairs in such manner as those in occupation of the islands shall themselves design.

During the days of the prohibition law of the United States of America these islands were the foot place and base for the smuggling of the products, particularly the wines of France which came over to this country—that is, using the words "this country" in the sense of our sphere—and from those islands would be transferred, by way of the nearest port in the United States, to this, our country, the smuggled products to the American parties to the offenses, in violation of the laws of the United States.

There came a time, sir, when, after having repealed the prohibition amendment and after we proceeded to conduct the commerce in spirituous liquors in such manner as the sense of our own people seemed to suggest, or at least to approve, there was not such a call for the smuggling of wines and liquors. Those of these islands, beholding that they were put out of commission, turned courageously to their own country to complain that they were, like Othello, "without occupation", when his occupation of killing human beings had been denied him further as a warrior.

From time to time, this matter proceeding, France has lately returned a privilege to those of the islands that they may continue their occupation of smuggling—or handling, we may say, in their own method—such produce as serves their commercial desires and their personal needs, meretricious as they are. Thus the previous system of smuggling has been taken up of bringing in alcohol, importing this alcohol from such foreign country as is agreeable, and then smuggling it into the United States of America, greatly to the disservice of our own land, to say nothing of the loss of such revenues from alcohol as our internal-revenue laws afford the United States of America in the execution of its own legitimate congressional acts.

Mr. President, when some action is taken, or some is sought, to stay this form of smuggling, we are met by the great Government of France with the very frank announcement that they are perfectly powerless. We have a repetition—if I may be pardoned for touching upon a bit of poetic sentiment on this subject—of what is given us in the opera Carmen, where the smugglers between the two lands of Spain and France have exemption from punitive law, and thus the privilege to pursue their course, upon the announced doctrine of each country that they are powerless to disturb them. It is confessed in the history that if they are disturbed—as we gather, sir, from the treatise which all of us know as The Cigarette Maker of Seville—if they are disturbed in their enjoyment and privilege of smuggling, they will turn to be offenders against the law, criminals in one form or the other, and forage upon the lands both of France and of Spain, and to avoid these results their privilege as smugglers is not to be interfered with by government!

We now have it from a great government of law and order, it is believed, and constitutional authority—the nation of France—that the smugglers of these two islands are to be allowed to pursue their course upon the theory that they were brought down to great need when they were prohibited, and unless they shall now be encouraged or allowed they will in some form forage upon the near Government, Canada, on the one hand, or produce some offense of some nature for which France, the mother country of the islands, will be held responsible.

The question before us, then, is one which I bring to the attention of the Senate, a solution put in a very frank form. I therefore at this time, here, when the distinguished Governor General of Canada is our guest today, a gentleman of great eminence in letters, a scholar in statesmanship, and one who in the newspaper world has been histrionic as well as the representative of history—and may he greatly enjoy his visit—at the same time the new Ambassador of France, Monsieur Bonnét, a renowned statesman and a distinguished diplomat, is now in our midst, newly assuming his duties, naturally announcing his position as one in which he is working to produce through his office the greatest harmony between his country and this of ours—sir, in this aspect, I suggest that these two ambassadors shall quickly come to some understanding, and these two countries, the British Empire—particularly England—and its interest in Canada, together with France, join in the knowledge that now and here is an opportunity to pay something on the debts and discharge much of their obligation.

The treaty which is now being negotiated to give these countries the right to buy with us and sell with us, but not to pray with us, notwithstanding affords them the opportunity which I now rise to present to my honorable colleagues—that France proceed to deed to the United States these islands which are in the St. Lawrence River; that France recognize the juxtaposition which these islands hold to the United States; and that Canada recognize the relationship of the islands to the shores of Canada, and that she join in behalf of the British Empire, at the instance of England, and with its consent, to grant to the United States such a portion of Canada along the St. Lawrence as will give the United States such territory as not being occupied there by citizens as will in quantity afford us a base where we can establish a government that will adjoin the United States and yet confront the St. Lawrence, through which we can govern these islands, protect the property which belongs to our honorable opponents, if we may speak of them as such, as debtors—either France or Canada—and preserve our own interest in maintaining a government there consistent with the institutions of this our United States of America. Here, by this, we enjoy to a great degree that which partakes of some credit to us in behalf of the debts to which these distinguished Governments, for some reason, find themselves wholly unable to contribute in money anything.

Mr. President, lately we have had the statement made on this floor from eminent source that there was a move afoot to consider these debts on the part of the debtors. May I be so bold—let me add the word "audacious"—as to assume the nothing done in the long lapse of time since the promise is because of no opportunity. Therefore, I put it that while the Governor General of part of the British Empire is with us, and likewise the new Ambassador from France, it is now the convenient hour when we may consider the carrying out of something in connection with this treaty presented and the promise heretofore presented.

I have heretofore on this floor boldly asserted that it was my intention to press upon the Republic of America that they grant no trade treaty that gave preferences to any land which owed us money which they had taken from our people, and even refused to pay the money, at the same time affronting us with the insult that we were "Shylocks" and that thus we were seeking to impose upon them by oppressing their people in our demands for our rights.

I therefore suggest that since a new treaty of trade between ourselves and France now is under consideration, France add to that treaty that these islands in the St. Lawrence to which we have alluded be transferred by France to the United States; that this transfer be credited for such just value as will be ascertained as just upon the debt; also that the British Empire shall, through its agent and one of its daughters, in the exercise of justice and sweet humanity, contribute such portion of the shores nearby on the St. Lawrence as will enable us to have a base on which we can establish a government out of our own borders to take care of these islands. In this system we protect the property of any foreigner and the citizens of any foreign nation and the subjects of any foreign country. For the time has come when we should have now some evidence of good faith on the part of these lands.

I wish to quote the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], who now with this full-seated Senate sits before me, in his speech a short time ago on this floor touching this subject called attention to the fact that there was one duty:

> Either pay these debts, make a movement toward their adjustment, or if you do not feel you can, or if you do not feel you will, then let it be understood that you do not intend to pay them, by which we may rid the subject of further painful consideration.

Mr. President, I desire to say that here is an opportunity which has suddenly arisen, and if these distinguished debtors wish to find a way by which they may make a contribution wholly consistent with what might be called the law of nations and the justice between people who affect to be friends, this is the hour.

Mr. President, the world at present is too much agitated in the conflict between nations not to realize how a little thing, how a very little thing, can continue these conflicts and awaken new strife between nations. Therefore, there is submitted to us now the thought that where nations have been friends and the evidences of such friendship have been given, as we have given them, allowing the raids upon our Treasury, enhanced at that time by what we thought was the necessity—but justified, as we thought, upon the ground of friendship, sir, I say that now, when the opportunity comes, they may knit a new friendship, revive themselves a new confidence, and give some show to the United States of a desire to hold us in companionship by their deeds of friendship and justice.

We turn to the Holy Scripture to remind them that they are commanded—

> Come, let us reason together—
> That righteousness may at last obtain.

I thank the Senate for allowing me to intrude my views on the subject I present at this particular moment.

REORGANIZATION OF FEDERAL JUDICIARY—THE SUPREME COURT

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, I think it is a truism of politics that whenever one is bitten by the insect which is known to buzz around one's bonnet and put in his ear aspiration to be President of the United States he never gets over the bite. This has been true of eminent men, even of distinguished jurists who have sat upon the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States. It was true of Mr. Justice McLean, of Ohio, who was always running for President. It was true of Chief Justice Chase, who, as he tottered to his grave at the ripe old age of 81, I believe, was still running for President. It was true of Mr. Justice Davis, of Illinois, who ran for the United States Senate while upon the bench, and then sought the nomination of his party for the Presidency after he left the bench.

I wish to invite the attention of Senators today to the fact that the great and distinguished Chief Justice—and he is great and distinguished—who now honors and graces the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States was once a candidate for President, and I venture to think that he has never forgotten the many lessons he learned so well in the arena of politics.

When the distinguished senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] by some method of inquiry reached the ear of the Chief Justice of the United States, the Chief Justice could not resist the great temptation to get into a good political fight. So, as is said in the vernacular of the prize ring, the Chief Justice "led with his chin." He wrote a letter to the Senator from Montana, and that letter, like ancient Gaul, was divided into three parts—facts, fiction, and dictum.

The facts were those which the Chief Justice had to turn to the Clerk of his Court to obtain. They were facts which that distinguished and experienced statesman who is chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], had already asked from the only source from which they could be obtained, namely, the Clerk of the Supreme Court. But the Chief Justice took his Sunday to dig out the facts in order that when this new champion of the Supreme Court went into the arena on Monday morning he would find in his corner seconding him the Chief Justice of the United States. So he spent his entire Sunday getting together facts for the Senator from Montana in order that the Senator might appear with them before the Committee on the Judiciary on Monday; and those facts, of course, had already been requisitioned and were furnished by the Clerk of the Court to the committee yesterday.

The fiction was that part of the Chief Justice's letter in which he would have us believe that all of the petitions for certiorari that come up to the Supreme Court receive consideration at the hands of the Justices of the Court, when everyone knows that such petitions are handled very largely by the law clerks of the Justices.

The dictum in that letter was the advisory opinion which the Chief Justice essayed to give us on a proposition that was not even before the United States Senate or the House of Representatives. So when day before yesterday he handed down the opinion for the majority of the Court, in which the Court reversed itself on the question of the minimum wage—the Court today does not believe what it did 10 months ago—it is not surprising that the Chief Justice of the United States in justifying this about face on the part of the Court should resort to some kind of explanation that did not explain.

In other words, the Chief Justice in trying to explain why the Supreme Court has made this about face, has at least hinted in the opinion that it was due to the fact that the Adkins case, when the Tipaldo case came before the Court last June, was not before the Court for consideration, that is to say that the petition for certiorari in that case only asked a hearing to distinguish the Adkins case, and not for a reconsideration of it, and therefore the question was not before the Court. In that respect I think perhaps the Chief Justice is a little disingenuous in his methods and perhaps not altogether frank. We find in the Washington minimum-wage case decided day before yesterday, the case of West Coast Hotel Co. against Parrish, that the Supreme Court at long last has upheld State minimum-wage legislation for women and has reversed the position it had taken in the New York minimum-wage case—Morehead against Tipaldo—last June, and the District of Columbia case—Adkins against Children's Hospital—14 years ago.

Those who have accused President Roosevelt of seeking to amend the Constitution must now admit that the Supreme Court itself has in effect amended the Constitution.

We were told no later than the last campaign that the decision of the Supreme Court in the Tipaldo case made it absolutely necessary that we go to the people and seek an amendment in order that we might have minimum-wage legislation in this country. Mr. Landon was so impressed with the force of that argument that he amended the platform of his party by saying that he wanted the convention to understand that if he were the nominee of the convention he would go to the people and tell them that we ought to seek an amendment to the Constitution in order that the States might have the right to enact this kind of legislation.

This present judicial amendment of the Constitution was brought about by a shift in the vote of a single Justice, because the Court in the Washington case divided 5 to 4. So it happens that the Constitution on Monday, March 29, 1937, does not mean the same thing that it meant on Monday, June 1, 1936. What position would we be in today had we followed the political preachments of the last campaign and submitted to the people of this country a constitutional amendment in order that we might have the minimum-wage legislation only to have the Supreme Court, by an about face, make an amendment wholly unnecessary?

Mr. President, on Monday, June 1, 1936, the Court stated:

> The decision (the Adkins decision in 1923) and the reasoning upon which it rests clearly show that the State is without power by any form of legislation to prohibit, change, or nullify contracts between employers and adult women workers as to the amount of wages to be paid.

And on Monday, March 29, 1937, the Court declared that the Adkins decision is no longer the law of the land.

Of course, the Chief Justice, who spoke for a majority of the Court in the Washington case, might have explained that the change of heart was due to the fact that both the Democratic and Republican Parties vigorously dissented from the interpretation given by the Court to the Constitution in the Morehead case on June 1, and that the election returns in November had conclusively demonstrated that the people of the United States were not prepared to accept the Court's narrow interpretation of the Constitution.

So, as was pointed out in an editorial published in the Christian Science Monitor of yesterday, there is at least one Justice of the Supreme Court who follows election returns.

The Chief Justice, however, was somewhat disingenious in explaining why some members of the Court had determined to yield their own personal economic predilections to a higher law of political expediency. The Chief Justice stated:

> The Court (in the Morehead case) considered that the only question before it was whether the Adkins case was distinguishable and that reconsideration of that decision had not been sought. Upon that point the Court said: "The petition for the writ sought review upon the ground that this case (Morehead) is distinguishable from that one (Adkins). No application has been made for reconsideration of the constitutional question there decided. The validity of the principles upon which that decision rests is not challenged. This Court confines itself to the ground upon which the writ was asked or granted * * *. Here the review granted was no broader than that sought by the petitioner * * *. He is not entitled and does not ask to be heard upon the question whether the Adkins case should be overruled."

It is very strange, however, that the Chief Justice did not choose to explain why the Court had refused to entertain a petition for rehearing in the Morehead case, which was made not only by the State of New York, whose statute was immediately involved, but by the State of Illinois, whose statute was necessarily affected by the Morehead decision. The petitions of both States begged the Court not to permit the rights of millions of workingwomen to be jeopardized and obscured by legal technicalities. The petition for rehearing by the State of New York stated:

> On a constitutional issue of such importance the decision of this Court should not be left obscured by possible doubts on principles essential to the legal rights and welfare of millions of citizens. In the light of the quoted excerpts from the petition from the writ of certiorari which this Court granted; in the light of the fact that four members of this Court sought to have the issues thus presented determined, it is earnestly urged on the Court that the apparently restricted basis of the Court's opinion be enlarged to cover the truly vital issues presented.
> Because of the importance of the issues herein, whatever be the ultimate determination of this Court, there should be a finality to its decision on the principles of constitutional law involved. It should be free of possible misconstruction by reason of procedural technicalities.
> The New York statute at issue was framed with a zealous regard for private rights and with a deep respect for the decisions of this Court as found in prior cases. The New York Court of Appeals certified that its decision was based upon the Adkins case. Surely, before such statute is finally struck down, a deliberate and full reconsideration should be given of the issues on the merits, and a decision reached that will leave no doubt where the way lies and where action by legislation may or may not tread.
> Wherefore on the foregoing grounds it is respectfully urged that this petition for a rehearing be granted and that the judgment on such reconsideration be reversed.

The petition in support of this rehearing filed by amicus curiae on the part of the State of Illinois emphasizes the same proposition, and in that petition for rehearing earnestly plead with the Court to review and reconsider the Adkins case.

The petition in support of rehearing by the State of Illinois stated:

> When the immediate welfare of millions of American workingwomen and the constitutional powers of the States of the Union are at stake, it seems imperative that there be not even the remotest ambiguity as to the scope of a decision of this Court. * * *
> The prevailing opinion in this cause was expressly based upon a supposition that the State of New York had not asked this Court to reconsider the constitutional questions decided in Adkins v. Children's Hospital (261 U. S. 525) and that the validity of the principles upon which the Adkins decision rested were not challenged. In its petition for rehearing the State of New York has clearly indicated that it desires this Court to reconsider the Adkins case and the principles therein declared and to review all constitutional issues involved in the instant proceeding without limitation or restriction. No technical obstacle now stands in the way of such a reconsideration.
> The State of Illinois is not unmindful of the proper regard which must be given to orderly appellate procedure. But the decision of this Court in this case does not merely discharge the relator, Tipaldo, from custody. Although it does not technically affect the validity of the legislation of Illinois and other States, the decision will unquestionably obstruct the enforcement of minimum-wage legislation throughout the Union until such time as this Court authoritatively restates the principles declared in the Adkins case and determines their application to existing legislation. As a practical matter, the Tipaldo decision affects the interests and the welfare of millions who are not familiar with the niceties of legal procedures. Four members of this Court were of the opinion that no procedural difficulty stood in the way of a clear-cut decision on the merits. Certainly, it is now within the power of this Court without violence to the requirements of orderly appellate procedure to consider the substantive constitutional issues. * * *

Whatever may be the ultimate decision of this Court, the issues involving the constitutional rights of the States and welfare of millions of their citizens are too significant and momentous to be decided with apparent finality without full consideration of the merits.

Thus after 20 years of unabated struggle, minimum-wage legislation is for the first time sustained by the Supreme Court by a bare majority vote. Four members of the Court still insist upon putting upon the words "due process" and "equal protection of the law" an interpretation that is difficult for lawyers to understand and impossible for the laymen to grasp. Only by the vacillating vote of a single Justice was the constitutional right of the State legislatures reinstated after what seemed to be a hopeless struggle—to paraphrase Justice Holmes—to educate the Justices "in the obvious." Four out of the nine Justices have dramatically revealed that they still entertain a view of the Constitution strikingly at variance with that of Chief Justice Marshall and the founding fathers, because the view of the four dissenting Judges would obviously make it impossible for the Constitution "to endure for ages to come and to be adaptable to the various crises of human events", as stated by Chief Justice Marshall. Unless the present personnel of the Court is enlarged, every new and debatable constitutional issue will come before the Court with four Justices definitely hostile to any theory which would permit the Constitution to be adapted to the needs of the time. On the other hand, there would be four who would adopt the views of Chief Justice Marshall and hold that the Constitution should be construed in the light of changing conditions; while one Justice moves around we know not where. If there should be any difference among any one of the five Justices whose minds are at all open regarding the applicability of the Constitution to new problems, the efforts of the legislatures, State or Federal, to meet those problems will be nullified. It is intolerable that in this period of social and economic change the adaptability of the Constitution and the continuity of legal growth should rest upon the vacillating judgment and human frailty of a single Justice.

The history of minimum-wage legislation before the Supreme Court has shown that it is perfectly futile to attempt to avoid the rigors of the decisions of the Court which are determined by the economic views or prejudices of the Justices by improved draftsmanship. The New York minimum-wage statute was drafted with the greatest care and competency to meet the objections specifically raised by the Court in the Adkins case. And Chief Justice Hughes, dissenting in the Morehead case, expressly took note of "its"—the New York statutes—"provisions for careful and deliberate procedure" and found that the New York statute was free of the feature so strongly denounced in the Adkins case. Yet the majority struck down the carefully drawn statute in the Morehead case with even greater alacrity than it struck down the statute in the Adkins case. And then in the Washington case it reverses itself and sustains a statute which contains the very feature which, more than any other, as the Court stated in the Adkins case, stamped the statute as arbitrary and invalid. Economic predilections do not yield to skilled draftsmanship, although sometimes they yield to political expediency.

Now, may I call the attention of the Senate to the strange quirk of fate in the history and course of the minimum-wage proposition. Last night I turned, in a reminiscent mood, to a recent volume published by Drew Pearson and Robert S. Allen, called "The Nine Old Men", and refreshed by recollection about the course of minimum-wage legislation and how in the first instance by a mere whim of fate the minimum-wage law happened to be declared unconstitutional. I quote from this book:

Luck dealt its first blow against minimum wages—

when the Oregon Minimum Wage Act came before the Supreme Court in 1914.

Justice Brandeis had been counsel for the minimum-wage advocates and now abstained from voting, making the Court's vote a tie, 4 to 4, which sustained the Oregon law, but left the final fate of minimum-wage legislation uncertain. Industrial interests, anxious to defeat the law, hoped that a change of personnel among the Nine Old Men might swing luck their way.

Meanwhile, other States had adopted minimum-wage laws, and every one of their supreme courts—Massachusetts, Minnesota, Arkansas, and Washington—upheld its constitutionality unanimously or by large majorities. Meanwhile, also, Congress adopted a minimum-wage law for the District of Columbia. This was tested in the Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia on June 6, 1921, and here for the second time the hand of fate intervened. Justice Robb had been thrown from his horse, was absent from the bench, and Justice Stafford, of the District of Columbia Supreme Court, was designated to sit in his place. He and Justice Smith voted to uphold the minimum-wage law, Justice Van Orsdel dissenting.

But June 9, 3 days later, counsel for those opposing the District of Columbia minimum-wage law appeared before Justice Robb, who had now recovered, and asked for a rehearing. Justice Robb is a close friend of Justice McReynolds, for years lived in the same apartment house with him, and is famous as one of the few justices as reactionary as McReynolds. Counsel opposed to the minimum-wage law knew, therefore, that it would get sympathetic consideration from Robb, which it did. Robb joined with Van Orsdel, and, although the chief justice objected, ordered the case reheard.

This, it should be recalled, was in June 1921. If Justice Robb had not been thrown from his horse, and if the case had been appealed directly to the Supreme Court, it would have been argued during the winter term of 1921 or early 1922, at which time six Justices—Taft, Holmes, Brandeis, Clarke, Day, and Pitney—all favorable to minimum-wage legislation, were on the bench. Even with Brandeis abstaining, five favorable Justices remained—sufficient to approve the bill.

But luck had intervened. The case was delayed. And during the time required for the rehearing, Justices Pitney, Clarke, and Day all resigned. They were replaced by one Justice who favored social legislation—Sanford; and by two vigorous reactionaries—Sutherland and Butler. So finally, when Justice Robb and Van Orsdel finished mauling the Minimum Wage Act in their lower court, it limped up to the Nine Old Men and, on April 9, 1923, Sutherland, one of the newly-appointed Justices, handed down the majority opinion against it.

And so we see it came about that a judge thrown from his horse amended the Constitution.

Mr. President, a few weeks ago I pointed out on the floor of the Senate the fact that three times previously in the history of our country the Supreme Court had come in conflict with the avowed policy of Congress and three times the verdict of history was against the Supreme Court. Now the fourth time the Supreme Court has come in conflict with the avowed policy of Congress and of the States, and the verdict of history is against the Court. I refer in the four instances to the Dred Scott decision, reversed by the Civil War; the Legal Tender decision, reversed by the Supreme Court itself within a period of a few months; and I may add that by its reversal Chief Justice Hughes said in his book on the Supreme Court the Court itself then and there inflicted upon the Court a mortal wound, which leads me to observe that perhaps the decision of day before yesterday may have inflicted another one.

Then there was the decision concerning the income-tax law, which was held unconstitutional because one judge changed his mind overnight. That decision of the Court was reversed by constitutional amendment. Finally the minimum-wage legislation, first held unconstitutional, and last June its unconstitutionality was reaffirmed, and day before yesterday the Supreme Court reversed itself to declare such legislation constitutional.

So, for an institution that has to support a halo that is a pretty bad record.

I wish to invite attention, in conclusion, to one other fact of history—that in the four instances to which I have alluded three times a judge from Pennsylvania played the leading role. I first refer to Justice Strong, who was placed upon the Supreme Court by Grant in order that the Legal Tender cases might be upheld. After the legal-tender decision in Hepburn against Griswold had been handed down declaring the act unconstitutional, Mr. Justice Strong and Mr. Justice Bradley ascended the bench, and, with three Lincoln appointees upon the bench, the cases were reopened and reheard; and Mr. Justice Strong, of Pennsylvania, wrote the opinion that reversed the Supreme Court and upheld the Legal Tender Acts and inflicted the mortal wound referred to by the Chief Justice.

So when the Income Tax case was before the Supreme Court and was argued, the Court stood 4 to 4. Mr. Justice Jackson was ill at the time. Then when Justice Jackson returned to the bench and the case was reargued he voted to sustain the act, and it became apparent that Justice Shiras, who had voted to hold the act constitutional, had changed his mind in the meantime, and finally held the income-tax law unconstitutional, and Justice Shiras was from Pennsylvania.

So in the historic opinion of day before yesterday the Constitution is amended, as the Philadelphia Record says, by the act of Mr. Justice Roberts, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. MINTON. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. That is no reflection on the Guffey bill which is pending, is it?

Mr. MINTON. I hope not; and I have high hope that that bill will be received kindly not only by judges from Pennsylvania but elsewhere.

So, Mr. President, I am unwilling that the policy of this country shall be committed to the instability of Mr. Justice Roberts' mind. I am further unwilling, Mr. President, that a state of affairs shall exist in this country whereby the Constitution may be amended by the horsemanship of the Justices; and further, Mr. President, I am unwilling that the destiny of this Nation shall ride with the power that fate so often puts in the hands of Justices from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, in view of the fact that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MINTON] has so ably pointed out to the Senate the situation which exists, I desire to add that I think no unbiased, fair-minded individual can carefully study the opinions of the Court for the last few years, particularly taking into consideration the language of the minority opinion in the Washington minimum-wage case of Monday, and deny that the one man in the United States who has more power than anybody else is Associate Justice Owen Josephus Roberts.

In the past few weeks there have been some who have talked about fear of a dictatorship, who have told us that we are faced with the possibility of someone like a Hitler or Mussolini gaining power in this country. So far as the decisions upon important fundamental questions are concerned, Associate Justice Roberts today has just as much power as any Mussolini or any Hitler.

I think it might be well at this point to place in the RECORD something about the life of Associate Justice Roberts. I take what he himself has written for the record in "Who's Who in America", not with the idea that it casts any reflection upon Justice Roberts, but in order that we may pause for a moment and consider whether or not the people of the country would want to place these absolute dictatorial powers in the hands of such a man, if they had the right to choose him, in view of the cloistered life Justice Roberts has led, in view of the fact that never at any time in his life has he had an opportunity to come in contact with the people of the country so as to be able to understand their problems, and their nature, and their emotions. I read:

Roberts, Owen Josephus, Justice, Supreme Court of the United States. Born at Philadelphia, Pa., May 2, 1875.

Then his parents' names are given. He began the practice of law at Philadelphia 1898; first assistant district attorney, Philadelphia County, 1901–04; assistant professor of law, University of Pennsylvania, 1898–1918; appointed special deputy attorney general to represent United States Government in prosecution of cases arising under espionage act and served in that capacity until 1924 when he was appointed to prosecute the oil cases, and in June 1930 was appointed to the Supreme Court of the United States.

This is the life record, written by himself, of the man who today wields more power and more influence than anybody in the United States.

REGULATION OF BITUMINOUS-COAL INDUSTRY

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 4985) to regulate interstate commerce in bituminous coal, and for other purposes.

Mr. GUFFEY obtained the floor.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, before the Senator from Pennsylvania begins his discussion of the important matter now before the Senate, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Connally	King	Pepper
Andrews	Dieterich	Lee	Pittman
Ashurst	Duffy	Lewis	Pope
Austin	Ellender	Lodge	Radcliffe
Bachman	Frazier	Logan	Reynolds

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, the bill for the regulation of the bituminous-coal industry, which the Senate is now considering, is one which has aroused my intense personal interest. My boyhood days were spent in the coal fields of western Pennsylvania.

Associations in later years brought me in close touch with men whose lives have been spent in the coal industry. The squalor and misery of mining camps in the past is vividly pictured in my mind from actual experience. I know only too well the conditions which have prevailed in the mining districts in time of labor disorders resulting from the effort of the miners to secure fair wages and decent working conditions. Too long bankruptcy, starvation wages, strikes, and public disorders have been the tokens by which the bituminous-coal industry is known.

In 1935, when I first took my seat as Senator from Pennsylvania, I considered it both a duty and a privilege to introduce a bill for the regulation of bituminous coal. That bill, after lengthy hearings, became the Bituminous Coal Conservation Act of 1935. When early in May 1936 the Supreme Court of the United States declared the principal provisions of that act to be invalid and inoperative, despite the clear holding of four of the Justices that the price provisions were valid and were separable from the labor provisions I immediately reintroduced the bill, deleting the labor provisions which had been found objectionable by the Court. In due course that bill passed the House of Representatives and was favorably reported by the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, but the adjournment of Congress came before consideration could be given by the Senate.

On the first day of the present legislative session I again introduced a bill for regulation of the bituminous-coal industry, patterned after the bill of 1936, but modified in minor particulars to reflect the results of further study and administrative experience. That bill has passed the House of Representatives by an overwhelming majority; in fact, without a record vote. The Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate has reported the bill with certain amendments, and the measure now comes before us for consideration and final action.

It is not my purpose to discuss at length the detailed provisions of the bill relating to the regulation of interstate commerce in bituminous coal. As to the power of the Congress to enact such a measure, it is sufficient for me to voice my belief that the measure is clearly within our power to regulate commerce among the several States. As the Chief Justice of the United States said in his dissenting opinion filed in the Carter case:

> Undoubtedly transactions in carrying on interstate commerce are subject to the Federal power to regulate that commerce, and the control of charges and the protection of fair competition in that commerce are familiar illustrations of the exercise of the power as the Interstate Commerce Act, the Packers and Stockyards Act, and the Antitrust Acts abundantly show. The Court has repeatedly stated that the power to regulate interstate commerce among the several States is supreme and plenary.

The measure which we are considering is not one hastily drawn in the light of a temporary emergency. It is the fruit of years of study by men eminent in public and private life. It bears the endorsement of an overwhelming majority of producers in the coal industry, and it is supported by the men who gain their livelihood through working in the mines, because of their firm belief that only through a stabilization of coal prices and the prevention of unfair trade practices and indiscriminate price cutting can the producers of coal be maintained in a position where they are able to pay fair wages and provide adequate working conditions in the mines.

To a person unfamiliar with the coal industry, its methods of doing business are difficult of comprehension. Coal men are the same the world over, as is proven by the fact that in other countries governments were long ago forced to adopt regulatory measures. In this country, whether producers come from Pennsylvania, Alabama, Kentucky, or Colorado, they are all imbued with the same strange desire to drive themselves into bankruptcy through continued selling of their coal at less than production costs. Their sole ambition appears to be the wresting of tonnage from their competitors; and success or failure is measured not in terms of profit or loss but in terms of tons of coal which they have been able to produce and sell.

We are considering a measure for relief of a Nation-wide industry, representing an investment today of more than three and one-half billion dollars; an industry which in times of prosperity as well as depression continues an unending practice of operating at a loss. Only in times of emergency, when strikes, disruptions of transportation facilities, or war conditions intervene, has the industry been able to report profits instead of losses.

In the year 1920, when the total number of producing units in the industry exceeded 8,000, only 1,234 companies made reports to the Internal Revenue Department, showing a total net income from the industry of $249,000,000, resulting in an income-tax liability of $76,000,000.

In the year 1933, 1,996 companies reported a net operating income of $7,250,000; but from the reports of others there appears a net loss for the industry in that year of $47,550,000. Certainly sound national economy cannot permit the continued operation of a basic natural-resource industry under such conditions.

The experience of our Nation during the past few years has taught us a costly lesson. As a country, we have been blessed with natural resources which have been the envy of many of the nations of Europe, and these resources have done much toward assuring our national prosperity. But scientists tell us that supplies of these resources are not inexhaustible.

In the case of the bituminous-coal industry we are told that the coal fields which are closest to the consuming centers are beginning to show the effects of years of operation, and that before long those industries dependent upon coal for their supplies of energy and raw material must seek more distant coal fields, with attendant higher transportation costs, or must accept and use coals of lower grade and more costly to mine, which now are being rejected. Engineers tell us also that in the coal industry we are today carrying on the business of mining that resource with an annual avoidable waste of almost 150,000,000 tons, one-third of the amount of coal which we use each year.

Therefore I believe that it is a clear responsibility and duty of the Congress to take steps looking toward the conservation of our natural resources. We must end the indiscriminate mining of coal, done under the pressure of competition, which forces coal producers to mine only that coal which is cheapest and most readily produced.

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. GUFFEY. Certainly.

Mr. POPE. A few minutes ago the Senator referred to the fact that the Supreme Court overruled what the Senator called the price-fixing features of the Bituminous Coal Conservation Act of 1935 by a 5-to-4 decision. What was the decision on the labor features of the act?

Mr. GUFFEY. The Court did not overrule the price-fixing features; they refused to rule on them. They said the price-fixing features were not separable from the labor provisions. They declared unconstitutional the labor provisions, and therefore the whole act failed.

Mr. POPE. They refused to recognize the separability clause of the act?

Mr. GUFFEY. That is true.

Mr. POPE. And therefore held the whole act inoperative?

Mr. GUFFEY. Yes; although four of the nine Justices said that the price-fixing features were separable from the others.

There are other impelling reasons for action by the Congress. Bituminous coal has been a subject of concern to the National Government for many years. At least 20 investigations and hearings have been held by committees and agencies of the Congress. Their findings are indisputable. We have under consideration an industry now supplying one-half of the heat and energy for our Nation, and one which in the future must serve as our primary source of light, heat, and power.

It is an industry employing directly almost half a million men, with hundreds of communities throughout 28 coal-producing States enjoying prosperity or suffering distress as the fortunes of the coal industry rise or fall. Our railroads, which for years have been a ward of the Government under the Interstate Commerce Act, derive more than 20 percent of their revenues from the transportation of coal; and in the list of commodities transported no more profitable item is to be found. The purchase of equipment and supplies for the mines involves the expenditure of millions of dollars annually, and many industries in sections remote from coal areas feel the effects of distress in the coal industry.

The picture of labor relations in the industry in past years is not a pretty one. Men have worked long hours in the mines, often under most adverse conditions, only to find their pay envelopes empty after payment of their debts to company stores. Many of the mining camps for years were mere prisons in which miners and their families dragged out a dreary existence, lacking many of the necessities, enjoying none of the luxuries of life. And let me say here that there is no guaranty or assurance that these conditions will not return; for it is inevitable that unless the coal industry attains some degree of prosperity, unless the coal producers are able to sell their product at a price which will permit the payment of fair wages, the vicious circle of price cutting and wage reduction will begin again.

It is hard for me to believe that democracy has reached its goal when we find men engaged in a major national industry earning as little as an average wage of $560 per year. That was the average earning of the coal miner in 1933. As a result of operation of the National Recovery Act, in 1934 this was increased to $834, and in 1935 to $911—an amount pitifully inadequate to support a miner and his family according to American standards of living, and to repay for the hazards which coal mining involves.

And we cannot overlook general conditions in mining communities dependent upon the coal industry. Both in times of general prosperity and of depression these communities have waged a battle for continued existence, and dependent as they are upon the miners and their families, they too must succeed or fail with the industry.

From my study of bituminous coal I find nothing which leads me to the belief that the coal producers themselves can or will ever correct these conditions by voluntary action. In fact, the same causes which brought about demoralization will prevent operators, individually or collectively, from taking any constructive action. The coal-producing States are also helpless to deal with conditions in the marketing of coal.

Although the subject has frequently been considered, there exists no record of any successful action by an individual State or by any group of coal-producing States in dealing with the problem of coal. Here again long-standing economic and sectional differences preclude the possibility of concerted action. Therefore, it has long been my opinion that if any situation in the industrial world requires intervention of the strong arm of the Federal Government, it is to be found in the case of bituminous coal today.

In the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, when the Carter case was heard, that court found that—

> Coal is the Nation's greatest and primary source of energy, vital to the public welfare, of the utmost importance to the industrial and economic life of the Nation and the health and comfort of its inhabitants; and that its distribution in interstate commerce should be regular, continuous, and free of interruptions, obstructions, burdens, and restraints.

The court also found that there existed—

> A condition of unrestrained and destructive competition in the system of distribution and marketing such coal, and of destructive price cutting, burdening and restraining interstate commerce and dislocating and diverting its normal flow.

In the Supreme Court, Mr. Justice Cardozo, in a dissenting opinion filed in the Carter case, which expressed the belief that the conclusion of the majority members of the Court was incorrect, described the conditions of the industry as follows:

> Overproduction was at a point where free competition had been degraded into anarchy. Prices had been cut so low that profit had become impossible for all except a lucky handful. Wages came down along with prices and with profits. There were strikes, at times Nation-wide in extent, at other times spreading over broad areas and many mines, with the accompaniment of violence and bloodshed and misery and bitter feeling * * * the plight of the industry was not merely a menace to owners and to mine workers—it was and had long been a menace to the public, deeply concerned in a steady and uniform supply of a fuel so vital to the national economy.

And I fully concur with the learned Justice when he said:

> Congress was not condemned to inaction in the face of price wars and wage wars so pregnant with disaster. Commerce had been choked and burdened; its normal flow had been diverted from one State to another; there had been bankruptcy and waste and ruin alike for capital and for labor.

And the learned Justice closed with this significant statement:

> The liberty protected by the fifth amendment does not include the right to persist in this anarchic riot.

I am one of those millions of Americans who have a broad conception of the powers and duties of government. It is not enough that the National Government maintain an Army and Navy for our defense; that we administer the public lands and safeguard our rivers and harbors; nor does complete fulfillment of its duties lie in a mere preservation of harmonious relations among the 48 States of the Union.

Our Nation has grown in population and in wealth; inventive genius has brought us the advantages and the problems of the machine age; the accumulation of wealth has led to the growth of industrial and financial combinations, Nation-wide in their scope, whose assets run into figures exceeding our power of conception.

The complexities of modern economic life no longer permit the isolation of communities or districts. Surely the depression, which came to its crisis in the last year of President Hoover's administration, has made that clear. As was said in the case of Appalachian Coals, Inc., v. United States (288 U. S. 344):

> When industry is grievously hurt, when producing concerns fail, when unemployment mounts, and communities dependent upon profitable production are prostrated, the wells of commerce go dry.

Truly the "wells of commerce" in the bituminous-coal industry have long been dry, and the resultant misery and suffering can never be calculated in terms of money.

I am, therefore, convinced that the Federal Government has an urgent duty to perform for the bituminous-coal industry, not merely on behalf of labor in the industry, not solely in the interest of coal producers, but for the safeguarding of our most valuable natural resource, for the preservation of the health and welfare of large numbers of our people, for the preservation of a vitally important industry, and the assurance of adequate and dependable coal supplies to our industries and homes.

Through the power of the Federal Government, and only through that power, can these purposes be accomplished, and our chief concern should be whether the method of regulation proposed in the bill is one within the powers of the Congress and adequate to the needs of the situation.

The bill is drawn so as to bring it clearly within the light of limitations which constitutional interpretation has imposed upon the power of Congress. The desired purpose is to be accomplished by the establishment of minimum prices and the regulation of trade practices in accordance with standards and by methods of procedure which are clearly set forth in the bill.

I am well aware that some men eminent in public life view the principle of price regulation with great concern. It may be argued by opponents of the measure that for more than a century the prosperity of our Nation has been based upon a principle of "free and unrestricted competition." I call attention to the fact that no industry has ever enjoyed unrestricted competition more than bituminous coal, and there is no greater proof of the folly of that theory than this industry which produces and distributes bituminous coal.

Speaking of business and industry generally, we do not today have free competition in fact in this country. Consider for a moment the situation which prevails almost universally in the marketing of gasoline. If free competition determines prices, then it is merely a strange coincidence that competing companies in communities without number sell their comparable products at the same price.

Again, I recall reading in the newspapers a short time ago of an increase in the price of certain steel products. It must have been by some miraculous coincidence that all the producing companies advanced their prices the same amount on the same day. I also recall that in testimony presented before the Senate Interstate Commerce Committee in 1936 leading coal producers called attention to the fact that in their purchases of supplies they very frequently found prices to be the same regardless of the source of supply. I recall also that not so many months ago a distinguished member of the President's Cabinet complained in no uncertain terms of the fact that in the case of hundreds of commodities on which bids were submitted to the Government striking similarities of price existed.

Despite the broad prohibitory laws against restraints of trade which have been enacted in the past 50 years, private industry today, in utter disregard of those restraints, is generally engaged in fixing prices by one method or another. Either less intelligence prevails in the coal industry, or the producers are influenced by different factors than in other industries, for here we find nothing but demoralized prices and vicious circles of price and wage cutting.

Review, if we will, the history of natural-resource industries, and we shall find, as I have found, that there can be only one result of so-called free competition—a monopoly of the industry in the hands of a favored few. I repeat that not all the broad prohibitory laws which can be enacted will prevent the gradual monopolization of the coal industry if the present free and unrestricted competition is to continue.

Today there are less than 6,000 substantial producers of bituminous coal in the United States, and of these less than 100 produce one-third of the Nation's coal; and every week of continued free competition is marked by the bankruptcy of more producers. To me the future of coal, unregulated by the Federal Government, is clear—a straight and certain path to monopoly, hedged in only by the graves of those who have met financial death at the hands of their more rugged and more powerful competitors.

Today we are dealing not with a theory but with a fact. Our action must be determined by principles which fit modern conditions. The theory of "let business alone" may have served a useful purpose in an earlier generation; but if our economic system is to survive, if democratic government is to perform its true function, if the people of the United States are to remain a free and prosperous people, and if we are to preserve liberty and real opportunity to the average American, then the arm of the Federal Government must be raised to guarantee them, not free competition, but fair competition; and that is the precise principle upon which this bill for the regulation of the bituminous-coal industry is based.

The bill does not plan the banning of individual initiative and action; on the contrary, it seeks to preserve a fair competitive opportunity to the men engaged in the coal industry by barring the use of unfair-trade practices, and by forbidding particularly favored or less scrupulous units from wiping out their competitors by indiscriminate price cutting.

For years the coal industry has been cursed by the presence of a small group of men whose only motto is, "Let the strongest survive"; who count their victories in terms of tons of coal and not of dollars earned; who think nothing of the misery and suffering imposed by low wages upon those who are depending upon the coal industry for their livelihood; who act in utter disregard of the national interest, which requires us to have at all times adequate and dependable supplies of coal for homes and industries. Again, the coal producer who is fair and intelligent finds himself constrained by forces which he can neither combat nor control, and pressure from consuming interests for price concessions has long dictated the policies of the coal industry.

A few days ago I reviewed with interest the annual report for the year 1936, published by one of the largest and strongest companies in the coal industry, endowed with all the advantages of geographical location, with adequate facilities for the mining and preparation of coal, possessing unequaled opportunities for marketing, and with strong financial relationships in consuming markets.

The report indicates a substantial gain in coal tonnage, but that gain was accompanied by a heavier financial loss. I find that in recent years the same company has maintained an unenviable record of continuing losses, with the single exception of the year 1934, in which year the National Recovery Act forced it to make a profit. A study of the industry will quickly reveal the fact that in the case of a large majority of the coal companies their statements reveal a similar condition.

The bill which the Senate now has under consideration proposes to regulate interstate commerce in bituminous coal by providing for the establishment of minimum prices below which the coal producer may not sell his commodity. Those prices are to be based on average costs of production, determined in the manner prescribed in the bill, thus affording protection not only to labor in the industry but particularly to the smaller operator as against his larger competitor.

From the consumer's standpoint, I find nothing in the measure which inspires me with fear or concern. I believe it to be a sound principle of any business—a principle which government should endorse and support—that the product of an industry must generally be sold at prices which at least equal costs of production; and I believe no fair-minded consumer of coal who is considerate not only of his own future interests but also of the general welfare of the country can deny that the bituminous-coal industry is entitled to a price for coal which at least meets its costs.

Regulation of commerce through the medium of prices is not a new principle in our law. As Mr. Chief Justice Hughes said in his dissenting opinion filed in the Carter case:

> Whether the policy of fixing prices of commodities sold in interstate commerce is a sound policy is not for our consideration. The question of that policy, and of its particular application, is for Congress. * * * We are not at liberty to deny to the Congress, with respect to interstate commerce, a power commensurate with that enjoyed by the States in the regulation of their internal commerce.

The Supreme Court unhesitatingly upheld, in the case of Nebbia v. New York (291 U. S. 502), the power of a State to prescribe minimum prices for milk when "the conditions or practices in an industry make unrestricted competition an inadequate safeguard of the consumers' interests, produce waste harmful to the public, threaten ultimately to cut off the supply of a commodity needed by the public, or portend the destruction of the industry itself." I ask the Senate to note the striking similarity between the conditions which the Court describes as existing in the milk business and those which we all know prevail in the coal industry.

To me, the need for regulation of the bituminous-coal industry is clear, and the authority of the Congress to deal with the industry in the manner prescribed in the bill is likewise unquestioned. It is the duty of the Federal Government to safeguard and conserve our greatest natural resource. It is a proper function to destroy those insidious influences in the coal industry which have driven the industry to bankruptcy, and which will, if unchecked, eventually drive it to monopoly. It is our humane duty to safeguard the national public interest by restoring health to a sick industry by bringing greater safety and more decent standards of working and living to hundreds of thousands of miners and their families, and by safeguarding for consumers, both present and future, adequate supplies of a necessary commodity at fair prices.

These reasons should compel every clear-thinking American citizen to favor the legislation which I have proposed. Its legality is clear. Its adequacy is testified to by the overwhelming weight of opinion in the industry. Its opponents have found no substantial flaw in the methods proposed. The fairness of the principles involved cannot be denied.

Today the sea of future business regulation lies immediately before the Congress, unknown and uncharted. The problem of bituminous coal affords us an opportunity to chart our course upon that sea, and our action on this measure will undoubtedly serve as a most valuable guide for future reckonings.

I believe approval of the pending measure will mark substantial progress toward the port of true economic freedom in America; and it is therefore my sincere hope that the Senate will concur in the action of the House of Representatives by promptly passing the measure as it has been reported by the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HERRING in the chair). The bill is before the Senate and the clerk will state the first amendment of the committee.

The first amendment of the Committee on Interstate Commerce was, in section 2, under the heading "National Bituminous Coal Commission", on page 3, line 12, after the word "attorneys", to insert "managers and employees of the statistical bureaus hereinafter provided for", so as to read:

> SEC. 2. (a) There is hereby established in the Department of the Interior a National Bituminous Coal Commission (herein referred to as commission), which shall be composed of seven members appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for a term of 4 years. The commission shall annually designate its chairman, and shall have a seal which shall be judicially recognized. Any person appointed to fill a vacancy shall be appointed only for the unexpired term of his predecessor in office. The commission shall have an office in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, and shall convene at such times and places as the majority of the commission shall determine. Two members of the commission shall have been experienced bituminous coal mine workers, two shall have had previous experience as producers, but none of the members shall have any financial interest, direct or indirect, in the mining, transportation, or sale of, or manufacture of equipment for, coal (whether or not bituminous coal), oil, or gas, or in the generation, transmission, or sale of hydroelectric power, or in the manufacture of equipment for the use thereof, and shall not actively engage in any other business, vocation, or employment. Not more than one commissioner shall be a resident of any one State, and not more than one commissioner shall be a resident of any one of the districts hereinafter established, but a change in any of the boundaries of the districts, made by the commission as hereinafter provided, shall not affect the tenure of office of any commissioner then serving. Any commissioner may be removed by the President for inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office. The commission is authorized to appoint and fix the compensation and duties of a secretary and necessary professional, clerical, and other assistants. With the exception of the secretary, a clerk to each commissioner, the attorneys, managers and employees of the statistical bureaus hereinafter provided for, and such special agents, technical experts, and examiners as the commission may require, all employees of the commission shall be appointed and their compensation fixed in accordance with the provisions of the civil-service laws and the Classification Act of 1923, as amended. No person appointed without regard to the provisions of the civil-service laws shall be related to any member of the commission by marriage or within the third degree by blood. The commission is authorized to accept and utilize voluntary and uncompensated services of any person or of any official of a State or political subdivision thereof. The members of the commission shall each receive compensation at the rate of $10,000 per year and necessary traveling expenses. Such Commission shall have the power to make and promulgate all reasonable rules and regulations for carrying out the provisions of this act and shall annually make full report of its activities to the Secretary of the Interior for transmission to Congress. A majority of the commission shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business, and a vacancy in the commission shall not impair the right of the remaining members to exercise all the power of the commission. No order which is subject to judicial review under section 6, and no rule or regulation which has the force and effect of law, shall be made or prescribed by the commission, unless it has given reasonable public notice of a hearing, and unless it has afforded to interested parties an opportunity to be heard, and unless it has made findings of fact. Such findings, if supported by substantial evidence, shall be conclusive upon review thereof by any court of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 4, line 16, after the words "United States", to strike out:

The commission may establish divisions deemed necessary for the proper dispatch of its business, and may refer any matter to an individual commissioner, who shall exercise all the powers and authority of the commission in the premises: Provided, That any person in interest may, upon written petition, secure a review by the commission of the report, findings, or order of such commissioner.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

The commission may establish divisions, each of which divisions shall consist of not less than three of its members, as it may deem necessary for the proper dispatch of its business. Each such division shall exercise all the powers and authority of the commission in the premises: Provided, That any person in interest may, upon written petition, secure a review by the commission of the report, finding, or order of such division. The commission may by its order assign or refer any matter within its jurisdiction under this act to an individual commissioner, to a board composed of employees of the commission, or to an examiner, to be designated by such order, for hearing and the recommendation of an appropriate order in the premises. Each individual commissioner, board, or examiner, when so directed by order of the commission, shall have power to administer oaths and affirmations, to examine witnesses, and receive evidence. The commission is authorized to make contracts for personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere and to establish and maintain such offices throughout the United States as it deems necessary for the effective administration of this act.

Within the limits of such appropriations as are made from time to time, the commission is hereby authorized to initiate, promote, and conduct research designed to improve standards and methods used in the mining, preparation, conservation, distribution, and utilization of coal and the discovery of additional uses for coal, and for such purposes shall have authority to assist educational, governmental, and other research institutions in conducting research in coal, and to do such other acts and things as it deems necessary and proper to promote the use of coal and its derivatives.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I am not familiar with the purport of this amendment. However, I know that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], who is present, and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] desire to discuss the bill, probably the philosophy of it, and some of the committee amendments. Is the Senator from West Virginia anxious that the Senate consider or finally adopt the committee amendments this afternoon?

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, it is the desire of those who favor the passage of the bill to dispose of all the committee amendments this afternoon. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] has a number of amendments which he wishes to offer. He will have an opportunity to present them tomorrow.

Mr. McNARY. Did the committee as a whole agree to the amendments which are now being considered?

Mr. NEELY. The committee agreed to all of them, and to the most of them by a unanimous vote.

Mr. McNARY. The opposition goes to the general intent and purpose of the bill rather than to the amendments?

Mr. NEELY. That is correct.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I will say in that connection, if the Senator will yield for that purpose, that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] offered an amendment in the committee, and gave notice that he would offer in the Senate an amendment to one of the committee amendments; and, in view of that fact, when we reach the amendment, I think it ought to be passed over until the Senator from Vermont can be given an opportunity to offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

Mr. McNARY. If the matter is protected in that fashion, I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment on page 4, line 16.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I desire to say a word. I understood the clerk was reading on page 4 of the bill. There was an amendment on page 3, was there not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHITE. Someone must have worked fast, because I missed it.

Mr. President, if there is an amendment pending now I wish to say a word about this amendment on page 3, although it is too late to do any good.

This is another instance where we are permitting the employment of an unlimited number of persons by the organization created by the bill without any reference whatever to the civil-service laws of the United States. I think that at some time, if we are to have any civil service left, there should be a halt called in this tendency. I am utterly unable to see why employees of a statistical bureau should not be appointed as a result of civil-service examination and should not be appointed because of merit. If there is any character or kind of work the qualifications for which can be determined by an examination by the Civil Service Commission, it seems to me it is that required of an employee of a statistical bureau.

Although the amendment has been adopted, I wish to voice my protest against any such provision.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next amendment reported by the committee.

The next amendment was, in section 3 (e), page 9, line 24, after the word "The", to strike out "taxes" and insert "tax", and in the same line, after the word "by", to insert "subsection (a) of", so as to make the paragraph read:

(e) The tax imposed by subsection (a) of this section shall not apply in the case of a sale of coal for the exclusive use of the United States or of any State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia, or any political subdivision of any of them, for use in the performance of governmental functions. Under regulations prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, a credit against the tax imposed by subsection (a) of this section or a refund may be allowed or made to any producer of coal in the amount of such tax paid with respect to the sale of coal to any vendee, if the producer has in his possession such evidence as the regulations may prescribe that such coal was resold by any person for the exclusive use of the United States or of any State, Territory of the United States, or the District of Columbia, or any political subdivision of any of them, for use in the performance of governmental functions.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 10, after line 22, to insert the subhead "Bituminous Coal Code."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, page 11, line 4, after the word "members", to insert "except as otherwise provided by subsection (h) of part II of this section", so as to read:

Producers accepting membership in the code as provided in section 5 (a) shall be, and are herein referred to as, code members, and the provisions of such code shall apply only to such code members except as otherwise provided by subsection (h) of part II of this section.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, paragraph (a), page 12, line 15, after the word "elected", to insert "The commission shall have power to remove any member of any district board upon its finding, after due notice and hearing, that said member is guilty of inefficiency, willful neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office"; in line 22, after the word "from", to insert "within or without", so as to make the paragraph read:

PART I. ORGANIZATION

(a) Twenty-three district boards of code members shall be organized. Each district board shall consist of not less than 3 nor more than 17 members. The number of members of the district board shall, subject to the approval of the commission, be determined by the majority vote of the district tonnage during the calendar year 1936 represented at a meeting of the code members of the district called for the purpose of such determination and for the election of such district board; and all code members within the district shall be given notice of the time and place of the meeting. All but one of the members of the district board shall be code members or representatives of code members truly representative of all the mines of the district. The number of such producer members shall be an even number. One-half of such producer members shall be elected by the majority in number of the code members of the district represented at the aforesaid meeting. The other producer members shall be elected by votes cast in the proportion of the annual tonnage output of the code members in the district, for the calendar year preceding the date of the election: Provided, That not more than one officer or employee of any code member within a district shall be a member of the district board at the same time. The remaining member of each district board shall be selected by the organization of employees representing the preponderant number of employees in the industry of the district in question. The term of district board members shall be 2 years and until their successors are elected. The commission shall have power to remove any member of any district board upon its finding, after due notice and hearing, that said member is guilty of inefficiency, willful neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office.

The district boards shall have power to adopt bylaws and rules of procedure, subject to approval of the commission, and to appoint officers from within or without their own membership, to fix their terms and compensation, to provide for reports, and to employ such committees, employees, arbitrators, and other persons necessary to effectuate their purposes. Members of the district board shall serve, as such, without compensation but may be reimbursed for their reasonable expenses. The territorial boundaries or limits of the 23 districts are set forth in the schedule entitled "Schedule of districts" and annexed to this act.

Whenever the commission upon investigation instituted upon its own motion or upon petition of any code member, district board, State or political subdivision thereof, or the consumers' counsel, after hearing finds that the territorial boundaries or limits of any district of minimum-price area are such as to make it substantially impracticable to establish minimum prices in accordance with all the standards set forth in subsectons (a) and (b) of part II of this section, and that a change in such territorial boundaries or limits or a division or consolidation of such districts or minimum-price areas would render the establishment of minimum prices in accordance with all such standards more practicable, it shall by order make such changes, divisions, and consolidations as it finds will substantially aid in such establishment of minimum prices.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, paragraph (c), page 14, line 6, after the word "board", to insert "or officer thereof"; and in line 9, after the word "member", to insert "or officer", so as to make the paragraph read:

(c) Nothing contained in this act shall constitute the members of a district board partners for any purpose. Nor shall any member of a district board or officer thereof be liable in any manner to anyone for any act of any other member, officer, agent, or employee of the district board. Nor shall any member or officer of a district board, exercising reasonable diligence in the conduct of his duties under this act, be liable to anyone for any action or omission to act under this act except for his own willful misfeasance or for nonfeasance involving moral turpitude.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, paragraph (d), page 14, line 15, after the word "effect", to insert "by its terms"; and in line 17, after the word "board", to insert "or officer thereof", so as to make the paragraph read:

(d) No action complying with the provisions of this section taken while this act is in effect, by its terms, or within 60 days thereafter, by any code member or by any district board, or officer thereof, shall be construed to be within the prohibitions of the antitrust laws of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in "Part II. Marketing", paragraph (a), page 15, after line 6, to strike out "In each district there may be established by the commission a statistical bureau which shall be an agency of the commission" and insert "For each district, or group of districts designated by the commission, there shall be established by the commission a statistical bureau which shall be operated and maintained as an agency of the commission", so as to read:

The commission shall have power to prescribe for code members minimum and maximum prices, and marketing rules and regulations, as follows:

(a) All code members shall report all spot orders to such statistical bureau hereinafter provided for as may be designated by the commission and shall file with it copies of all contracts for the sale of coal, copies of all invoices, copies of all credit memoranda, and such other information concerning the preparation, cost, sale, and distribution of coal as the commission may authorize or require. All such records shall be held by the statistical bureau as the confidential records of the code member filing such information.

For each district, or group of districts designated by the commission, there shall be established by the commission a statistical bureau which shall be operated and maintained as an agency of the commission. Each statistical bureau shall be under the direction of a manager, who shall be appointed by the commission. No producer, employee, or representative of a producer, and, except as the commission may specifically approve, no member of a district board or employee or representative thereof shall be an employee of any statistical bureau.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill the number of districts involved in this amendment?

Mr. NEELY. There are 23 production districts and 10 minimum-price areas.

Mr. McNARY. So there will be 33 in all?

Mr. NEELY. Yes; but the price areas will have no boards, and no significance except in relation to prices.

Mr. BARKLEY. The price areas overlap the districts which would be set up.

Mr. NEELY. That is true.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment on page 15, line 6.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next committee amendment will be stated.

The next amendment was in "Part II, Marketing", paragraph (a), on page 15, line 24, after the word "to", to strike out "mines and" and insert "mines"; in the same line, after the word "market", to strike out "areas" and insert "areas, values as to uses and seasonal demand"; and on page 16, line 9, after the word "compensation", to insert "occupational-diseases compensation", so as to read:

Each district board shall, from time to time on its own motion or when directed by the commission, propose minimum prices free on board transportation facilities at the mines for kinds, qualities, and sizes of coal produced in said district, and classification of coal and price variations as to mines, consuming market areas, values as to uses and seasonal demand. Said prices shall be proposed so as to yield a return per net ton for each district in a minimum price area, as such districts are identified and such area is defined in the subjoined table designated "minimum-price-area table", equal as nearly as may be to the weighted average of the total cost, per net ton, determined as hereinafter provided, of the tonnage of such minimum price area. The computation of the total costs shall include the cost of labor, supplies, power, taxes, insurance, workmen's compensation, occupational-diseases compensation, royalties, depreciation and depletion (as determined by the Bureau of Internal Revenue in the computation of the Federal income tax), and all other direct expenses of production, coal operators' association dues, district board assessments for board operating expenses only levied under the code, and reasonable costs of selling and the cost of administration.

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill a question. Since the majority of the Supreme Court did not pass upon the price-fixing features of the Coal Regulation Act of the last Congress, which act was declared to be unconstitutional, and since, as I understand, the price-fixing feature is the substantial part of the pending bill, would the Senator say, from his investigation, that there is authority for upholding that feature of the pending bill in other decisions of the Court?

Mr. NEELY. Yes; there is. In the Carter case the Supreme Court clearly indicated that there was authority for the exercise of such power on the part of Congress.

Mr. POPE. I observe in the majority opinion the statement that the majority of the Court wanted it to be distinctly understood that if that question were presented as a separate issue there was no indication that they would hold it constitutional. I will refer to the exact words if I can find them.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if I may be permitted to say a word, the minority of the Court, including Chief Justice Hughes, held that price fixing was valid, but the majority of the Court did not pass upon that question at all. The majority of the Court passed solely upon the question of labor and the fixing of wages, and held that the provisions of the act were inseparable, and therefore that the entire act fell.

Mr. POPE. I had in mind a paragraph in the majority opinion in which the Court used this language:

> The price-fixing provisions of the code are thus disposed of without coming to the question of their constitutionality; but neither this disposition of the matter, nor anything we have said, is to be taken as indicating that the Court is of opinion that these provisions, if separately enacted, could be sustained.

In the light of that statement by a majority of the Supreme Court, my question is if the Senator from West Virginia thinks there is sufficient authority from other decisions of the Supreme Court on the price-fixing feature to warrant us in believing that a majority of five of the Court will hold it constitutional in this instance?

Mr. NEELY. In the light of the important history which the Supreme Court made yesterday, I am not willing to say that there is sufficient authority in any of its decisions to justify a belief concerning the validity of this or any other proposed legislation. But I invite the attention of the able junior Senator from Idaho to certain language used by Mr. Chief Justice Hughes in the Carter case, which, to my mind, strongly indicates that he feels there is authority for price-fixing regulations such as are contained in this bill. I read from Mr. Chief Justice Hughes' opinion, as follows:

> Undoubtedly transactions in carrying on interstate commerce are subject to the Federal power to regulate that commerce, and the control of charges and the protection of fair competition in that commerce are familiar illustrations of the exercise of the power, as the Interstate Commerce Act, the Packers and Stockyards Act, and the antitrust acts abundantly show. The Court has repeatedly stated that the power to regulate interstate commerce among the several States is supreme and plenary (Minnesota Rate Cases, 230 U. S. 352, 398). It is "complete in itself, and may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations, other than are prescribed in the Constitution" (Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 1, 196). We are not at liberty to deny to the Congress, with respect to interstate commerce, a power commensurate with that enjoyed by the States in the regulation of their internal commerce. (See Nebbia v. New York, 291 U. S. 502.)
> Whether the policy of fixing prices of commodities sold in interstate commerce is a sound policy is not for our consideration. The question of that policy, and of its particular applications, is for Congress. * * *

I trust that what I have just read answers the Senator's question.

Mr. POPE. In this decision, which I have not had an opportunity to read fully, did Mr. Justice Roberts make any expression of opinion except insofar as he concurred with the majority?

Mr. NEELY. Mr. Justice Roberts filed no separate opinion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment which was last stated by the clerk.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Minimum-price-area table", on page 19, line 8, after the word "charges", to insert "or when otherwise required by this act,", so as to read:

> As soon as possible after its creation, each district board shall determine, from cost data submitted by the proper statistical bureau of the commission, the weighted average of the total costs of the ascertainable tonnage produced in the district in the calendar year 1936. The district board shall adjust the average costs so determined, as may be necessary to give effect to any changes in wage rates, hours of employment, or other factors substantially affecting costs, exclusive of seasonal changes, so as to reflect as accurately as possible any change or changes which may have been established since January 1, 1936. Such determination and the computations upon which it is based shall be promptly submitted to the commission by each district board in the respective minimum-price area. The commission shall thereupon determine the weighted average of the total costs of the tonnage for each minimum-price area in the calendar year 1936, adjusted as aforesaid, and transmit it to all the district boards within such minimum-price area. Said weighted average of the total costs shall be taken as the basis, to be effective until changed by the commission, for the proposal and establishment of minimum prices. Thereafter, upon satisfactory proof made at any time by any district board of a change in excess of 2 cents per net ton of 2,000 pounds in the weighted average of the total costs in the minimum-price area, exclusive of seasonal changes, or when otherwise required by this act, the commission shall increase or decrease the minimum prices accordingly. The weighted average figures of total cost determined as aforesaid shall be available to the public.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the same subhead, paragraph (b), page 19, line 24, after the word "commission", to insert "and as directed by the commission"; and on page 20, at the beginning of line 14, to insert "values as to uses, seasonal demand", so as to read:

> (b) District boards shall, under rules and regulations established by the commission, and as directed by the commission, coordinate in common consuming market areas upon a fair competitive basis the minimum prices and the rules and regulations proposed by them, respectively, under subsection (a) hereof. Such coordination, among other factors, but without limitation, shall take into account the various kinds, qualities, and sizes of coal, and transportation charges upon coal. All minimum prices proposed for any kind, quality, or size of coal for shipment into any common consuming market area shall be just and equitable, and not unduly prejudicial or preferential, as between and among districts, shall reflect, as nearly as possible, the relative market values, at points of delivery in each common consuming market area, of the various kinds, qualities, and sizes of coal produced in the various districts, taking into account values as to uses, seasonal demand, transportation methods and charges and their effect upon a reasonable opportunity to compete on a fair basis, and the competitive relationships between coal and other forms of fuel and energy; and shall preserve as nearly as may be existing fair competitive opportunities.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same paragraph, on page 21, line 1, to insert "and so far as practicable shall be not less than."

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment at the top of page 21, which has just been stated, and also the amendment on the same page, beginning in line 12 and extending to line 5, on page 22, be passed over for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection the amendments will be passed over, and the clerk will state the next amendment reported by the committee.

The next amendment was, under the same subhead, in paragraph (d), page 22, line 19, after the word "board", to insert "or member thereof"; in line 21, after the word "with", to strike out "such" and insert "the"; in line 24, after the word "by", to strike out "the" and insert "any minimum or"; in the same line, after the word "prices", to strike out "estabilshed" and insert "established"; and in line 25, after the word "to", to strike out "subsection" and insert "subsections (d) or (c)"; so as to make the paragraph read:

> (d) If any code member or district board or member thereof, or any State or political subdivision of a State, or the consumers' counsel, shall be dissatisfied with the coordination of prices or rules and regulations, or by a failure to establish such coordination of prices or rules and regulations, or by any minimum or maximum prices established pursuant to subsections (b) or (c) of part II of this section, he or it shall have the right, by petition, to make complaint to the commission, and the commission shall, under rules and regulations established by it, and after notice and hearing, make such order as may be required to effectuate the purpose of subsections (b) and (c) of part II of this section. Pending final disposition of such petition, and upon reasonable showing of necessity therefor, the commission may make such preliminary or temporary order as in its judgment may be appropriate, and not inconsistent with the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was under the same subhead, paragraph (e), page 23, line 18, after the words "prior to", to strike out "January 6, 1937" and insert "June 16, 1933. Any contract made on or subsequent to said date which provides for a price below such established minimum price shall be unenforceable as to such price provision", so as to read:

(e) No coal subject to the provisions of this section shall be sold or delivered or offered for sale at a price below the minimum or above the maximum therefor established by the commission, and the sale or delivery or offer for sale of coal at a price below such minimum or above such maximum shall constitute a violation of the code: Provided, That the provisions of this paragraph shall not apply to a lawful and bona-fide written contract entered into prior to June 16, 1933. Any contract made on or subsequent to said date which provides for a price below such established minimum price shall be unenforceable as to such price provision.

Mr. BORAH. I ask that that amendment also go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be passed over.

The next committee amendment was, under the same subhead, paragraph (e), page 23, at the beginning of line 23, to strike out "A" and insert "The making of a", so as to read:

The making of a contract for the sale of coal at a price below the minimum or above the maximum therefor established by the commission at the time of the making of the contract shall constitute a violation of the code, and such contract shall be invalid and unenforceable.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in paragraph (f), on page 25, line 1, after the word "commission", to insert "and to the office of the Consumers' Counsel", so as to make the paragraph read:

(f) All data, reports, and other information in the possession of any agency of the United States in relation to coal shall be available to the commission and to the office of the consumers' counsel for the administration of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in paragraph (g), on page 25, line 7, after the word "companies", to insert "or agencies"; in line 7, after the word "intermediaries", to strike out the word "or"; and in line 8, after the word "instrumentalities", to insert "or devices", so as to make the paragraph read:

(g) The price provisions of this act shall not be evaded or violated by or through the use of docks or other storage facilities or transportation facilities, or by or through the use of subsidiaries, affiliated sales or transportation companies or agencies or other intermediaries, instrumentalities, or devices, or by or through the absorption, directly or indirectly, of any transportation or incidental charge of whatsoever kind or character, or any part thereof. The commission is hereby authorized, after investigation and hearing, and upon notice to the interested parties, to make and issue rules and regulations to make this subsection effective.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 25, after line 13, to strike out:

(h) The commission shall prescribe the price allowance to and receivable by persons (whether or not code members) who purchase coal for resale, and resell it in not less than cargo or railroad carload lots; and shall require the maintenance by such persons, in the resale of coal, of the minimum prices established under this act.

And to insert:

(h) The commission shall, by order, prescribe due and reasonable maximum discounts or price allowances that may be made by code members to persons (whether or not code members), herein referred to as "distributors", who purchase coal for resale and resell it in not less than cargo or railroad carload lots; and shall require the maintenance and observance by such persons, in the resale of such coal, of the prices and marketing rules and regulations established under this section.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, wherein does that differ in practice from the language that has been stricken out?

Mr. NEELY. The Senator from Oregon will note that the original language is:

The commission shall, by order, prescribe maximum discounts or price allowances.

The amendment says that:

The commission shall, by order, prescribe due and reasonable maximum discounts or price allowances.

The modification consists of the insertion of the words "due and reasonable."

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, the Senator will also have in mind the change in the last line. That language differs from the language in the portion stricken out.

Mr. NEELY. Yes; in that it requires the persons indicated to observe the marketing rules and regulations established by the commission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment will be stated.

The next amendment of the Committee on Interstate Commerce was, under the subtitle, "Unfair methods of competition", in subsection (i), paragraph 1, page 26, line 14, after the word "following", to strike out "class" and insert "classes", so as to make the paragraph read:

UNFAIR METHODS OF COMPETITION

(i) The following practices with respect to coal shall be unfair methods of competition and shall constitute violations of the code:

1. The consignment of unordered coal, or the forwarding of coal which has not actually been sold, consigned to the producer or his agent: Provided, however, That coal which has not actually been sold may be forwarded, consigned to the producer or his agent at rail or track yards, tidewater ports, river ports, or lake ports, or docks beyond such ports, when for application to any of the following classes: Bunker coal, coal applicable against existing contracts, coal for storage (other than in railroad cars) by the producer or his agent in rail or track yards or on docks, wharves, or other yards for resale by the producer or his agent.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, this amendment comes under the heading "Unfair methods of competition." It appears from the reading of the subtitle, and paragraphs following, that an attempt has been made to write into the bill as many of the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law as is possible in order to protect the fixing of prices. Is that correct?

Mr. NEELY. That is correct.

Mr. TYDINGS. Was this language taken in part from the Sherman antitrust law?

Mr. NEELY. It was taken from that part of the act of 1935 which was not declared to be invalid by the Supreme Court.

Mr. TYDINGS. Can the Senator tell me to what extent the provisions of the Sherman Antitrust Act are absent from the present bill?

Mr. NEELY. I have not compared the bill with the Sherman Act. But, so far as practicable, the former is in harmony with the latter.

Mr. TYDINGS. As I read it, rebating and combinations to fix prices within the maximum and minimum limits are prohibited by the terms of the bill.

Without having much chance to study the bill, it appears that an attempt has been made by the authors of the bill to keep in the bill as many as possible of the Sherman Antitrust Act provisions.

Mr. NEELY. Let me add that the draftsman also endeavored to retain as much of the act of 1935 as possible without subjecting the bill to the Supreme Court's condemnation.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, while the bill does not attempt to track the language of the Antitrust Act and is not intended to do so literally, the act of 1935, from which this language is very largely copied, was intended to include those practices which are not only outlawed in the antitrust law, but which have been passed upon by the courts and have become a sort of code of fair practices under the antitrust law.

Mr. TYDINGS. I thank the Senator from Kentucky. I notice in a former part of the bill provision is made for the fixing of minimum prices. Provision is also made in certain cases for the fixing of maximum prices. Therefore there is a latitude between what the minimum and maximum prices might be on coal.

Mr. NEELY. That is correct.

Mr. TYDINGS. It is my understanding, from reading these particular provisions and the other provisions, that between the maximum and minimum prices an attempt has been made to prohibit the operators from fixing prices in violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act. At least it appears that way to me.

Mr. NEELY. An effort has also been made to prevent producers from fixing prices that would be unfair to the consumer.

Mr. TYDINGS. The reason why I asked the question is that the price might be fixed at 5 cents a ton under the maximum price. If I read the bill correctly, the intention is to fix the price at a minimum price and only to employ the maximum price in the event the operators should attempt to get around the Sherman Antitrust Act provision.

Mr. NEELY. Or attempt to impose upon the public by charging unreasonable prices.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from West Virginia yield?

Mr. NEELY. Certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, they would only come in contact with the antitrust law where they did that by combination or agreement, but this provision would apply to any individual operator who undertook to do such a thing.

Mr. NEELY. That is true.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator from West Virginia yield for a question?

Mr. NEELY. Certainly.

Mr. WHITE. As I recall, the Federal Trade Commission Act declares unfair methods to be unlawful. It does not declare what they are, but leaves that to be determined by administrative judgment and court interpretation. Is this an exclusive enumeration of things which constitute unfair methods of competition in the coal industry? Is this an attempt to give an exclusive enumeration of the practices which would constitute unfair methods of competition in the coal industry?

Mr. NEELY. In my opinion, no. The commission might determine that practices which are not mentioned in the bill are improper, and consequently prohibit them.

Mr. WHITE. Is it true that under the terms of the bill there would be authority in the coal commission to declare certain things to be unfair methods of competition, and that there is also left in the Federal Trade Commission authority to determine what is or is not an unfair method of competition?

Mr. NEELY. The bill does not attempt to diminish the authority of the Federal Trade Commission, or to interfere with that agency in any manner whatsoever.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from West Virginia yield further?

Mr. NEELY. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think the Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE] and I are talking about the same paragraph and perhaps we can get it cleared up.

On page 22, subsection (c) reads as follows:

(c) When, in the public interest, the commission deems it necessary to establish maximum prices for coal in order to protect the consumer of coal against unreasonably high prices therefor, the commission shall have the power to establish maximum prices free on board transportation facilities for coal in any district. Such maximum prices shall be established at a uniform increase above the minimum prices in effect within the district at the time, so that in the aggregate the maximum prices shall yield a reasonable return above the weighted average total cost of the district: Provided, That no maximum price shall be established for any mine which shall not yield a fair return on the fair value of the property.

The Senator from Maine and I want to know if it is the understanding of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. GUFFEY] that the coal commission will use this particular power to prohibit coal operators from fixing prices above the minimum prices which would not be in the public interest and would be in effect a violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act.

Mr. GUFFEY. The Senator from Maryland is correct.

Mr. WHITE. My question was rather directed to the language beginning on page 26, under the title "Unfair methods of competition." What I am trying to find out is whether the 12 or 13 practices which are here declared to be unfair methods of competition are an exclusive enumeration of unfair practices within the jurisdiction of the coal commission.

Mr. NEELY. In my opinion, they are not.

Mr. WHITE. Then can the coal commission declare to be unfair methods of competition other things than those mentioned here, and can the Federal Trade Commission also do the same thing?

Mr. NEELY. Undoubtedly.

Mr. WHITE. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment on page 26.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next amendment of the committee.

The next amendment was, on page 28, after line 22, to insert:

13. Employing any person or appointing any sales agent, at a compensation obviously disproportionate to the ordinary value of the service or services rendered, and whose employment or appointment is made with the primary intention and purpose of securing preferment with a purchaser or purchasers of coal.

It shall not be an unfair method of competition or a violation of the code or any requirement of this act (1) to sell to or through any bona-fide and legitimate farmers' cooperative organization duly organized under the laws of any State, Territory, the District of Columbia, or the United States, whether or not such organization grants rebates, discounts, patronage dividends, or other similar benefits to its members; (2) to sell through any intervening agency to any such cooperative organization; or (3) to pay or allow to any such cooperative organization or to any such intervening agency any discount, commission, rebate, or dividend ordinarily paid or allowed, or permitted by the code to be paid or allowed, to other purchasers for purchases in wholesale or middleman quantities.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, with reference to this amendment I should like to ask the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] if he is willing to have an understanding with me that if by tomorrow I prepare an amendment along the lines I have discussed with him which is satisfactory to him he will agree that action on this amendment may be reconsidered. I do not desire to hold it over.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I have discussed the matter to which the Senator from Washington refers with some of the friends of the bill. They think that the amendment which the Senator has suggested might, if adopted, be used by certain producers as a shelter for improper activities.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I will say to the Senator from West Virginia that I asked the persons interested to prepare another amendment, and the inquiry I make is based upon the theory that that amendment will be satisfactory to the Senator from West Virginia. I am simply asking, If I do prepare one that is satisfactory, whether or not the Senator will agree that action on this amendment may be reconsidered?

Mr. NEELY. Certainly, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee, beginning in line 23, page 28, and ending in line 17, page 29.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 29, line 20, after the word "board", to insert "or member thereof", so as to make the paragraph read:

(j) The commission shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine written complaints made by any code members, district board, or member thereof, State or political subdivision of a State, or the consumers' counsel, which charge any violation of the code specified in part II of this section. It shall make and publish rules and regulations for the consideration and hearing of any such complaint, and all interested parties shall be required to conform thereto. The commission shall make due effort toward adjustment of such complaints and shall endeavor to compose the differences of the parties, and shall make such order or orders in the premises, from time to time, as the facts and the circumstances warrant. Any such order shall be subject to review as are other orders of the commission.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 30, after line 17, to strike out:

SEC. 4–A. Whenever the commission upon investigation instituted upon its own motion or upon petition of any code member, district board, State or political subdivision thereof, or the consumers' counsel, after hearing finds that the prices of coal sold by producers in transactions in intrastate commerce cause any undue or unreasonable advantage, preference, or prejudice as between persons and localities in such commerce on the one hand and interstate commerce on the other hand, or any undue, unreasonable, or unjust discrimination against interstate commerce, the commission shall by order so declare and thereafter coal sold in such intrastate commerce shall be subject to the provisions of section 4 relating to prices.

And to insert:

SEC. 4–A. Whenever the commission upon investigation instituted upon its own motion or upon petition of any code member, district board, State or political subdivision thereof, or the consumers' counsel, after hearing finds that transactions in coal in intrastate commerce cause any undue or unreasonable advantage, preference, or prejudice as between persons and localities in such commerce on the one hand and interstate commerce in coal on the other hand, or any undue, unreasonable, or unjust discrimination against interstate commerce in coal, or in any manner directly affect interstate commerce in coal, the commission shall by order so declare and thereafter coal sold, delivered or offered for sale in such intrastate commerce shall be subject to the provisions of section 4.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, the striking out of section 4 (a) as printed in the bill, on page 30, and the insertion of a new section 4 (a), on page 31, cover the same general situation. From reading the new section 4 (a), on page 31, it appears that the commission, in addition to regulating interstate commerce in coal, if it finds that prices are lower on coal in intrastate commerce, may then regulate the traffic in coal within a State. My purpose in calling this provision to the attention of the authors and sponsors of the bill is to ask if they do not feel that perhaps that provision may jeopardize the validity of the act, at least in that respect.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I do not think so.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is practically writing into the law the principle laid down in the Shreveport case.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is true; in the railway case the same principle was applied; but, so far as I know, while the Court has applied the principle with reference to railroads, I do not think it has ever gone so far as to apply it to a commodity within a State. Perhaps I am mistaken.

Mr. BARKLEY. Probably the Court has not gone so far in the application of the doctrine to commodities as it has to the facility by means of which the commodity is transported; but Congress has the same power with respect to the commodity transported that it has with respect to the facility that transports it.

Mr. TYDINGS. That may be true; but I would disagree with the Senator from Kentucky and say that I believe the right to have control over a line of communication is a more comprehensive right than the right to have control over a commodity which may not in any stage pass over a line of communication over which Congress normally has exercised jurisdiction.

I am not criticizing this provision nor the philosophy of those who sponsor it. I rise simply to point out that this provision may cause the act to be invalidated when, perhaps, without the provision the act would stand.

Mr. BARKLEY. Even according to the recent decisions of the Court, if the situation here described, based on the Shreveport case, should directly affect interstate commerce, it would still, regardless of the Shreveport case, be within the power of Congress to regulate it.

Mr. TYDINGS. I was referring particularly to the Schechter case under the N. R. A., where the chicken was traced after it got into New York commerce.

Mr. BARKLEY. But in that case the Court for the first time laid down the doctrine of the difference between direct and indirect effect on interstate commerce.

Mr. TYDINGS. The provision is on the border line. I am not criticizing it; but it seemed to me that if the commission should attempt to regulate the price of coal produced and sold within a State, perhaps it would be going a step further than the courts would sustain.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I believe that the following paragraph from the opinion of the Supreme Court in the Carter case will allay the fears of the Senator from Maryland upon this point. What I am about to read is from the findings of the lower court, but it was quoted with approval by the Supreme Court:

Other findings are to the effect that such coal is generally sold f. o. b. mine, and the predominant portion of it shipped outside the State in which it is produced; that the distribution and marketing is predominantly interstate in character, and that the intrastate distribution and sale are so connected that interstate regulation cannot be accomplished effectively unless transactions of intrastate distribution and sale be regulated.

The court further found the existence of a condition of unrestrained and destructive competition in the system of distribution and marketing such coal, and of destructive price-cutting, burdening and restraining interstate commerce and dislocating and diverting its normal flow.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, in support of this contention, let me add to what the Senator has said the further thought that the power conferred by section 4 (a) is an optional power which the commission may exercise, and not a mandatory power; and it might be that the commission never would exercise this power, in which event, of course, it would not come into question.

Mr. NEELY. That is true.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from West Virginia whether this is not one of the sections to which the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] wished to offer an amendment.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I confess, with regret, that I do not remember the amendment which the Senator from Vermont expressed a desire to modify; but I have sent him a request to obtain an excuse from his important committee hearing, if possible, and come to the floor.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I have here a collection of amendments offered by the Senator from Vermont. I am unable to find one which relates to this committee amendment.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, with reference to section 4 (a), I desire to say that in my judgment it does go further than anything that has been decided by the Supreme Court up to the present time. However, if the philosophy of the bill is correct, and we are going to seek to do the things that it is desired to do with reference to interstate shipments of coal, and coal in general, then, in my judgment, unless the commission should be given the power to do the things described in section 4 (a), the whole bill would completely break down. In other words, so much of the coal of this country is used only in intrastate commerce that if those who produce it could break the price and cut the price of coal in intrastate commerce, and coal could be regulated only in interstate commerce, the bill would be completely ineffective.

Mr. President, while I am on my feet I desire to say just a few words with reference to another matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana is entitled to the floor.

CHICAGO GREAT WESTERN RAILROAD

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, on Thursday of last week, the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] presented a resolution directing the Committee on Interstate Commerce to inquire into the refusal of the trustees of the Chicago Great Western Railroad to pay certain awards made by the National Railroad Adjustment Board in favor of employees who are members of five of the standard railroad labor organizations—the Engineers, the Firemen and Enginemen, the Conductors, the Trainmen, and the Switchmen's Union of North America. The resolution came before the committee, and we are about to take it up and set it down for hearing; but I am glad to be able to report that since the Senator from Idaho introduced his resolution the trustees of the Chicago Great Western Railroad have agreed to pay the awards in full, thus ending the unfortunate controversy. I have no doubt that the action of the Senator from Idaho in calling the matter to the attention of this body had a most wholesome influence, and contributed materially to the result achieved. In fact, I am sure it was the only thing that compelled the trustees to agree to settle on the basis on which they were justly entitled to settle.

The amount involved in this case was not great—approximately $50,000—but the principle was of major importance.

When Congress enacted the amended Railway Labor Act a few years ago, we endeavored to set up machinery which would facilitate the speedy adjustment of disputes between the carriers and their employees. The law recognizes in the most definite way the railroad worker's right to join the labor organization of his choice. It bans company-supported unions and outlaws the vicious "yellow dog" contract. Finally, it sets up what the Senator from Idaho, in his resolution, very happily described as "a supreme court for railroad labor." We may later wish to destroy all the courts; but the act sets up what is commonly recognized by the railroad employees as a supreme court for railroad labor. This is what is known as the National Railroad Adjustment Board. It consists of 36 members, 18 selected by the carriers and 18 by the standard railroad labor organizations.

When a dispute arises concerning the proper interpretation of an agreement entered into between a carrier and a union the law contemplates that the representatives of the carrier and the union shall endeavor to reach an understanding. If that proves impossible, then an appeal may be taken to this supreme court—a tribunal made up of equal numbers of representatives of the carriers and the employees—and all men thoroughly familiar with every phase of railroad work. Should that tribunal become deadlocked, a referee may be called in.

It is difficult to imagine a fairer, a saner, method of adjusting industrial disputes. That the system has worked is evidenced by the fact that there has been no serious interruption of interstate traffic since this salutary law was enacted.

The National Railroad Adjustment Board has rendered a great number of decisions. Some were in favor of the unions, and some were in favor of the carriers. As I understand, the unions in every case have accepted the verdict of the Board. In some cases the carriers have not.

Perhaps the most flagrant example of a carrier's attempt to flaunt decisions of the National Railroad Adjustment Board is to be found in this case on the Chicago Great Western. The awards were made last June and July. They involved a number of individual grievances. The employees were so clearly right that in only one instance did the Board find it necessary to call in a referee.

Nevertheless, the trustees refused to pay the awards. I am informed they even appealed to Federal Judge Charles E. Woodward, the judge responsible for their appointment. Judge Woodward made the grave mistake of advising the trustees that it was not necessary for them to pay the awards until they were instructed to do so by a court of competent jurisdiction, notwithstanding the fact that he himself was a court of competent jurisdiction. Of course, that meant a lawsuit, and the unions, very properly, in my judgment, refused to become parties to long and expensive litigation.

They held that if the awards of the National Railroad Adjustment Board were not accepted, and if carriers persisted in appealing to the courts, the elaborate system which Congress had devised for the adjustment of disputes between carriers and their employees would be weakened and possibly destroyed.

So the unions polled their members, and the members voted to strike if the trustees did not accept the awards made by the National Railroad Adjustment Board. At that point the President of the Unied States appointed an emergency board to inquire into the facts, and that board, finding the facts substantially as I have stated them, endeavored to persuade the trustees to enter into fresh negotiations with the unions' representatives.

These negotiations dragged, and a few days before the Senator from Idaho introduced his resolution the trustee suggested they would settle on the basis of 10 cents on the dollar. Of course, the unions rejected that offer, and now the trustees have paid 100 cents on the dollar.

In my judgment they paid it only because of the fact that they were threatened that an investigation into the whole matter would be taken up by the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

All through these proceedings the representatives of the unions exhibited the patience and good judgment which we have come to associate with the leadership of the standard railroad labor organizations. Sorely provoked, they might have ordered the strike which their members had authorized them to call. Had they done that, we would have had another serious industrial struggle on our hands, and all because two trustees, appointed by a Federal court, refused to comply with the letter and spirit of a law which has won such widespread approbation that even the National Association of Manufacturers—an organization noted for its opposition to trade unionism—has suggested that it might be used as a model for a Federal law to govern all industries.

I am sure we are all glad the trustees of the Chicago Great Western have retreated from their untenable position. It is to be hoped that the managements of other railroads will follow their example.

We cannot afford to permit the amended Railway Labor Act, or any of its essential features, to be weakened or destroyed by short-sighted employers who, in order to gain a temporary advantage, are willing to invite an industrial war.

Of course, we should take exactly the same attitude toward the unions should they attempt to scuttle this beneficent legislation. There is not much danger of that, however. It is to their credit that the standard railroad-labor organizations sponsored the amended Railway Labor Act—the legislation with which the country is now so pleased. I am sure they will never do anything to jeopardize the structure they assisted in erecting.

I am sure that if other industrial organizations and other unions would adopt the same methods which have been adopted by the railroad brotherhoods and the railroads, many industrial disputes, such as those from which the country is now suffering, would be avoided, and we would generally be in a very much happier and better state.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, permit me to say, in connection with the remarks of the able Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], that this subject matter arose in a jurisdiction which I have the honor in part to represent. When the able Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] presented his resolution I assumed then to state to the Senate that I had been informed that the difference between the company, the trustees, and the men was very slight, and I felt that it could be composed, but that there was a difference as to the facts. The Senator from Idaho stated he was quite sure the resolution would give opportunity of investigation which would reveal the real facts.

Since then, while I have been in the Senate, I have been advised by the trustees and the counsel for the companies that a composure has been effected, as the Senator from Montana has just related, and I am pleased to join with him and with the officers of the company likewise in felicitations that complete peace and mutual confidence have followed between the company and its men.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I wish to say just a word. An award was made by the Board and the company offered 10 cents on the dollar in settlement of it. The President of the United States appointed a mediation board, and still the company refused to settle. It was only after a resolution was introduced in the Senate for an investigation of the situation that the Chicago Great Western finally paid the award, which had been made some time last June.

I hope that when other disputes of this kind arise the parties will settle them among themselves, following an award by the Board, regardless of whether the award is in favor of the unions or in favor of the companies, and that it will not be necessary every time, in order to get them to settle the award, to have a resolution introduced in the Senate for an investigation of the situation.

Mr. TYDINGS obtained the floor.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I cannot let the opportunity pass without just a word of gratification over the result of this legislation, not only before the Supreme Court but in its operations throughout the country. The cause of my gratification is that it was my good fortune to introduce in the House of Representatives the bill, like one introduced in the Senate by Senator Howell, of Nebraska, and which became known throughout the country then as the Howell-Barkley bill. The railroads desperately fought the measure in the House at that session, and were able to defeat it, but at the end of the session it was suggested by Members of the House and the Senate that the railroads and their employees get together during the recess of the Congress and see whether at the next session legislation of this character might not be enacted without serious opposition.

As a result of that suggestion the railroads and their employees, after many conferences during the recess, came to an agreement on the principle of the original bill, with very slight amendments, and the bill was enacted at the next session of the Congress. It is gratifying to all those who had any hand in the enactment of the law that it has been one of the most successful laws for settling labor disputes that has ever been placed on the statute books of the United States.

It is to the credit of both the railroads and the employees that they have in most cases tried in good faith to observe the spirit of the law. We all know that the standard railway brotherhoods are among the highest class of organized employees in the United States, and the success of the law and its final justification before the Supreme Court in a unanimous decision offer hope that in the near future we may be able to work out legislation which will solve all other industrial disputes with as much efficacy and with as much peace and lack of disturbance.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator from Kentucky was in the Senate when I first spoke, but he refreshes my memory. After the railroad brotherhoods and the railroads agreed upon this particular piece of legislation and both sides came before the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the Senate, the attorney for the National Association of Manufacturers came before the committee and opposed the proposed legislation, notwithstanding the fact that both sides had agreed to it. Now we find the National Association of Manufacturers lauding the law, stating that it is a good law and that it ought to be worked out in industrial organizations. I am extremely glad to see that the National Association of Manufacturers have finally seen the light and are coming to the conclusion that this is a good law.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, it is not out of order for even private organizations to reverse themselves, in the light of the reversals which are now in progress in public bodies.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, as I have listened to some of the statements today I have been led to reflect that everybody is pleased with the decisions which were handed down by the Supreme Court on Monday, at least all those who are opposed to packing the Supreme Court are. The only ones I know of who regret that the Supreme Court decided some of these cases favorably have been some of those who have favored adding six new members to the Court. They seem to be very sorry and very sore and very sad that the Supreme Court has decided as they wanted them to decide, because it has taken from them some of their arguments.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. Just a moment, and then I will yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. WHEELER. As a matter of fact, the only argument Mr. Landis used before the Committee on the Judiciary, as I recall his testimony, was that he wanted to have such a Court as would decide that minimum-wage laws are valid, and that the States should be permitted to enact minimum-wage laws. That is one of the peculiar aspects of the situation. The Supreme Court has decided that the States may enact minimum-wage laws, and all the boys are going around looking sad and sorry because of that fact.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, the bitterest lamentations I have heard from anyone come from those who are opposed to the President's plan.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I cannot yield. For once the Senator from Maryland is going to be bold enough to overrule the discussion of the Supreme Court.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will not the Senator from Maryland yield to me in order that I may say that I am glad of the Supreme Court's opinion?

Mr. BARKLEY. And will not the Senator also yield to me so that I may say I, too, am glad?

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, my only apprehension is that Mr. Justice Roberts might backslide.

Mr. TYDINGS. I now know how the minority is going to feel.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, who will guarantee the six will not backslide?

REGULATION OF THE BITUMINOUS-COAL INDUSTRY

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4985) to regulate interstate commerce in bituminous coal, and for other purposes.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I should like to ask a questions or two of those who have charge of the bill.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. GUFFEY] and the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] will recall that under the N. R. A. codes about 1,100 regulations were promulgated by the code authority, and provisions for punishment and fine accompanied those regulations. May I ask if it is the intention that the coal board shall likewise be in a position, without the sanction of Congress, to levy fines against violators of this proposed act?

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, in my opinion, the commission's only authority to punish refractory operators is expressly and explicitly stated in the bill.

Mr. TYDINGS. How would they be punished? Is the penalty for the punishment fixed in the bill itself, or is the commission to be authorized to fix those punishments in accordance with rules and regulations which it may promulgate?

Mr. NEELY. The commission's power to punish is limited to the revocation of membership in the code and revocation of exemption from the taxes imposed by section 3 (b) of the bill.

Mr. TYDINGS. One more question—and these questions arise from the fact that I have not had time to read the bill other than very hastily, and I am not as familiar with it as I should like to be. As I understand, the Commission cannot fix any punishments in addition to those provided in the bill, so far as violations of provisions of the bill are concerned; and no grant of authority to make rules and regulations providing for penalties or punishments, other than those contained in the bill itself, is to be given to the commission?

Mr. NEELY. The Senator's understanding is 100 percent correct.

Mr. TYDINGS. One more question. Referring again to page 26, under the heading "Unfair Methods of Competition", there are a number of paragraphs defining what is unfair competition. I should like to ask what punishment is provided, if any, and how it is to be dealt out to potential violators of the fair-code practices.

Mr. NEELY. As previously stated, so far as the commission is concerned, punishment is limited to revocation of membership in the code, and the benefits which code members enjoy.

Mr. TYDINGS. And the assessment of a fine of $1 a ton, I believe, is provided.

On page 27, subdivision 6, it is provided that—

The payment or allowance in any form or by any device of rebates, refunds, credits, or unearned discounts, or the extension to certain purchasers of services or privileges not extended to all purchasers under like terms and conditions, or under similar circumstances—is declared an unfair method of competition. Assuming that some operator violates that particular provision, then, as I understand, the penalty is that he is to be kicked out of the association, and a fine of $1 a ton is to be imposed on the coal which he sold in violation of the code. Is that correct?

Mr. NEELY. No; not a dollar a ton. The penalty is "double" the amount of the tax specified in section 3 (b) of the bill.

Mr. TYDINGS. There is a provision in the bill fixing a penalty of a dollar a ton for coal sold under the minimum price, or at a rebate. I have not the provision at my fingers' ends.

Mr. NEELY. The penalty provision which the Commission is empowered to administer is on page 35. It is as follows:

(c) Any producer whose membership in the code and whose right to an exemption from the tax imposed by section 3 (b) of this Act shall have been revoked and canceled may apply to the Commission and shall have the right to have his membership in the code restored upon payment by him to the United States of double the amount of the tax provided in section 3 (b) upon the sales price at the mine, or the market value at the mine if disposed of otherwise than by sale at the mine.

Mr. TYDINGS. What happens when the license of the individual operator who has violated the code is suspended? Can he then operate his mine?

Mr. NEELY. Certainly he could operate, but he would be deprived of the tax exemption which code members enjoy.

Mr. TYDINGS. And he gets no refund? In other words, the penalty goes really with the tax?

Mr. NEELY. Correct.

Mr. TYDINGS. But there is nothing in the bill, so far as the Senator knows, nor have I been able to discover anything, which permits the Commission to make what are in effect criminal laws, except as specifically defined in the bill itself, as to penalties for offenses.

Mr. NEELY. The Commission cannot make criminal laws.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment on pages 30 and 31 striking out section 4 (a), as printed in the bill, and inserting a new section 4 (a).

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next amendment of the committee.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Organization of the code", on page 35, line 8, after the word "of", to strike out "one and one-half times" and insert "double", and in line 24, after the word "amount", to strike out "of" and insert "to", so as to make the paragraph read:

(c) Any producer whose membership in the code and whose right to an exemption from the tax imposed by section 3 (b) of this act shall have been revoked and canceled may apply to the commission and shall have the right to have his membership in the code restored upon payment by him to the United States of double the amount of the tax provided in section 3 (b) upon the sales price at the mine, or the market value at the mine if disposed of otherwise than by sale at the mine, or if sold otherwise than through an arm's length transaction, of the coal sold or disposed of by the code member in violation of the code or regulations thereunder (but in no case shall such sales price or market value be taken to be less than the minimum price established by the commission for such coal and in effect at the time of such sale or other disposal), as found by the commission under subsection (b) hereof. The commission shall thereupon certify to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and to the collector of internal revenue for the internal-revenue collection district in which the producer resides the amount of the required payment as found under clause (5) of subsection (b), and upon payment of such amount to the commissioner or the collector such officer shall notify the commission thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 36, line 7, after the word "has", to strike out "an agent," and insert "a place of business", so as to make the paragraph read:

(d) Any code member who shall be injured in his business or property by any other code member by reason of the doing of any act which is forbidden or the failure to do any act which is required by this act or by the code or any regulation made thereunder, may sue therefor in any court of competent jurisdiction where the defendant resides, or is found or has a place of business, without respect to the amount in controversy, and shall recover threefold damages by him sustained, and the cost of suit, including a reasonable attorney's fee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 7, on page 40, line 14, after the word "refunds", to strike out "relating to the collection and disposition of internal-revenue taxes" and insert "applicable in respect of the taxes imposed by section 600 of the Revenue Act of 1926", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 7. All provisions of law, including penalties and refunds applicable in respect of the taxes imposed by section 600 of the Revenue Act of 1926, shall, insofar as applicable and not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, be applicable with respect to taxes imposed under this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 9, page 43, line 1, after the word "without", to strike out "restrain" and insert "restraint", so as to read:

SEC. 9. (a) It is hereby declared to be the public policy of the United States that—

(1) Employees of producers of coal shall have the right to organize and to bargain collectively with respect to their hours of labor, wages, and working conditions through representatives of their own choosing, without restraint, coercion, or interference on the part of the producers.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 44, line 14, after the word "producers", to insert "and distributors"; in line 16, after the word "producers", to insert "or distributors"; in line 20, after the word "producer", to insert "or distributor"; in line 22, after the word "producer", to insert "or distributor"; and on page 45, line 2, after the word "producer", to insert "or distributor", so as to make the paragraph read:

SEC. 10. (a) The commission may require reports from producers and distributors and may use such other sources of information available as it deems advisable, and may require producers or distributors to maintain a uniform system of accounting of costs, wages, operations, sales, profits, losses, and such other matters as may be required in the administration of this act. No information obtained from a producer or distributor disclosing costs of production or sales realization shall be made public without the consent of the producer or distributor from whom the same shall have been obtained, except where such disclosure is made in evidence in any hearing before the commission or any court and except that such information may be compiled in composite form in such manner as shall not be injurious to the interests of any producer or distributor and, as so compiled, may be published by the commission.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] has an amendment which he wishes to offer, to which the sponsors of the bill have no objection. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be considered at this time.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, I am not advised as to the attitude of some of the Members on this side of the Chamber who desire to be present when individual amendments are considered.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I desire to make a statement regarding the amendment. The amendment which I should like the privilege of offering now, because it is not certain that I can be here tomorrow, is on page 8, line 10, to strike out all after the word "tax", down to and including the word "coal" in line 15, page 8, and to insert in lieu thereof the following: "of 1 cent per ton of 2,000 pounds."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 8, line 10, it is proposed to strike out all after the word "tax" down to and including the word "coal", on page 8, line 15, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

Of 1 cent per ton of 2,000 pounds.

Mr. ROBINSON. The purpose of the amendment, as I conceive it, is to make more equitable and satisfactory arrangements with regard to the tax. It levies the tax on the quantity of the product.

Mr. BARKLEY. The effect, if the Senator will yield, is to make a straight tax of 1 cent per ton instead of having one-half of 1 percent of the sale price, whatever the sale price may be.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes. It levies the tax on the quantity of the product rather than on its price.

Let me say, in support of the amendment, that, according to my information it is acceptable to the proponents of the bill and to all parties who are directly interested in the bill. So I ask that the amendment may be considered now, in order that I may be able to be absent a part of the time tomorrow, if it shall be found imperative for me to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to considering at this time the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas? The Chair hears none, and the question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next committee amendment will be stated.

The next amendment of the Committee on Interstate Commerce was, in section 10, paragraph (c), page 45, line 13, after the word "producer", to insert "or distributor"; in line 16, after the word "for", to strike out "thirty" and insert "fifteen"; in line 17, after the word "producer", to insert "or distributor"; in line 18, after the words "sum of", to strike out "$50" and insert "$100"; in line 23, after the word "producer", to insert "or distributor", so as to make the paragraph read:

(c) If any producer or distributor required by this act or the code or regulation made thereunder to file a report shall fail to do so within the time fixed for filing the same, and such failure shall continue for 15 days after notice of such default, the producer or distributor shall forfeit to the United States the sum of $100 for each and every day of the continuance of such failure, which forfeiture shall be payable into the Treasury of the United States, and shall be recoverable in a civil suit in the name of the United States, brought in the district where the producer or distributor has his principal office or in any district in which he shall do business. It shall be the duty of the various district attorneys, under the direction of the Attorney General of the United States, to prosecute for the recovery of forfeiture.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 46, after line 2, to insert a new paragraph, as follows:

(d) Any person, firm, or corporation or other entity who shall knowingly purchase coal from any code member in such manner that the sale of such coal constitutes a violation of the code on the part of such code member shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall suffer a fine not exceeding $1 for each ton of coal so purchased.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 46, after line 10, to strike out:

SEC. 12. Any combination between producers creating a marketing agency for the disposal of competitive coal in interstate commerce at prices to be determined by such agency or by the agreement of the producers operating through such agency, shall be unlawful as a restraint of interstate trade and commerce within the provisions of the act of Congress of July 2, 1890, known as the Sherman Act, and acts amendatory and supplemental thereto, unless such producers have accepted the code provided for in section 4 and shall comply with its provisions and unless such marketing agency shall have been approved by the commission after a finding that such agency will not operate to impose undue restrictions on competition.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

SEC. 12. Any combination between producers creating a marketing agency for the disposal of competitive coals in interstate commerce or in intrastate commerce directly affecting interstate commerce in coal at prices to be determined by such agency, or by the agreement of the producers operating through such agency, shall, after promulgation of the code provided for in section 4, be unlawful as a restraint of interstate trade and commerce within the provisions of the act of Congress of July 2, 1890, known as the Sherman Act, and acts amendatory and supplemental thereto, unless such producers have accepted the code provided for in section 4 and shall comply with its provisions.

Subject to the approval of the commission, a marketing agency may, as to its members, or such marketing agencies may, as between and among themselves, provide for the cooperative marketing of their coal, at prices not below the effective minimum prices nor above the effective maximum prices prescribed in accordance with section 4: Provided, That no such approval shall be granted by the commission unless it shall find that the agreement under which such agency or agencies propose to function (1) will not unreasonably restrict the supply of coal in interstate commerce, (2) will not prevent the public from receiving coal at fair and reasonable prices, (3) will not operate against the public interest, and (4) that each such agency and its members have agreed to observe the effective marketing regulations and minimum and maximum prices from time to time established by the commission and otherwise to conduct the business and operations of the agency in conformity with reasonable regulations for the protection of the public interest, to be prescribed by the commission.

The commission may, by order, upon complaint of any code member, district board, or member thereof, any State or political subdivision thereof, the consumers' counsel or any other interested person, or on its own motion, suspend or revoke its prior approval of any such marketing agency agreement upon finding that the regulations and orders of the commission or the requirements of this section have been violated. Unless and until the approval of the commission is suspended or revoked, neither the agreement creating such marketing agency nor any agreement between such agencies, which has been approved by the commission, nor any act done in pursuance thereof, by such agency or agencies, or the members thereof, and not in violation of the terms of the commission's approval, shall be construed to be within the prohibitions of the antitrust laws of the United States.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I should like to invite the attention of the Senator having charge of the bill to the amendment beginning on page 46, after line 23, inserting a new section 12, reading in part:

SEC. 12. Any combinaion between producers creating a marketing agency for the disposal of competitive coals in interstate commerce or in intrastate commerce directly affecting interstate commerce in coal at prices to be determined by such agency, or by the agreement of the producers operating through such agency, shall, after promulgation of the code provided for in section 4, be unlawful as a restraint of interstate trade and commerce within the provisions of the act of Congress of July 2, 1890, known as the Sherman Act, and acts amendatory and supplemental thereto, unless such producers have accepted the code provided for in section 4 and shall comply with its provisions.

It seems to me that the words "unless such producers have accepted the code provided for in section 4 and shall comply with the provisions" should be stricken out. As the bill now reads it provides that if the producers sign the code they may violate the Sherman Antitrust Act.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. Further than that, would not the situation occur that one part of the people would be subjected to a criminal law and another part of the people would be exempted from it, and that would call the law in question?

Mr. BORAH. I think that is true; but, as I read the amendment—and I think I am correct in my construction of it—it is proposed to exempt those who join the code from the operation of the Sherman antitrust law, or within the construction of the Sherman antitrust law. If those who join the code should in any respect violate the Sherman antitrust law, they should not be exempted from the operation of the law; and I do not think we could exempt them. I do not want the antitrust law emasculated or repealed. I do not want a portion of the people amenable to the law and another portion not.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I take it, from what I have heard of the discussion of this bill, that that is precisely what the proponents of the measure intend and what they have accomplished by this language if it can be accomplished.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, to strike out the language indicated by the able Senator from Idaho would, in my opinion, mean the destruction of section 4, which is vital to the bill.

Mr. BORAH. I do not think so. I did not have any idea that it would have that effect.

Mr. BARKLEY. Section 4, beginning at the bottom of page 10, sets out what shall be contained in the code.

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. And the code sets out what can and what cannot be done. If we strike out the language on page 46, which applies to marketing agencies that may be recognized by the coal commission, we would make it impossible for section 4 to be operative. It would be impossible to get any such agencies to agree to operate as agencies if they were to be subject to prosecution under the antitrust law.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; exactly. I am not proposing to strike out all of section 12; I am proposing to strike out only the words "unless such producers have accepted the code provided for in section 4 and shall comply with its provisions."

Mr. BARKLEY. That would accomplish the very thing we are talking about, because the language in that amendment prior to that line makes the acts set forth unlawful under the Sherman Antitrust Act unless the parties have signed the code, whereas in the event they have signed the code the particular things specified do not become unlawful under the Sherman Antitrust Act. If we strike out that language, we might as well strike out section 4.

Mr. BORAH. Leaving the Sherman antitrust law on the books unrepealed and unmodified, how can we say that anybody shall be exempt from the operation of the law?

Mr. BARKLEY. I think we can say that those who sign the code and comply with its provisions, without which there might be a possibility of violation of the antitrust law, and who operate under it, may be lifted out from the provisions of the Antitrust Act.

Mr. BORAH. What would happen is that we would have the Sherman antitrust law in operation and binding all the people of the United States except those who would be members of this code. It is not proposed to repeal the Sherman antitrust law by any provision of this bill?

Mr. BARKLEY. The bill sets out, somewhat in detail, in section 4, which provides for the code, provisions that are somewhat similar, although in different language, to those of the antitrust law itself. The marketing agencies which are recognized and set up in this bill, if they operate together, might be said technically to violate the antitrust law. After having set up a code under which they must operate, the violation of which would result in a penalty in the matter of the tax and in other ways, the bill provides that if they comply practically with the provisions of section 4, which are, in a form, a rewriting of the Antitrust Act, then they shall not be subject again to the provisions of the Antitrust Act as written.

Mr. BORAH. If section 4 is in conflict with the Sherman antitrust law, then, insofar as it is in conflict with that law, it repeals the Sherman antitrust law. The latter statute would repeal the former law if it were in conflict with the former law.

I do not think section 4 is in conflict with the Sherman antitrust law. It undertakes to provide that certain things shall constitute unfair competition, but those things which it says shall constitute unfair competition are not in conflict with the Sherman antitrust law, but in harmony with it, in my judgment; and I assume they are put in there for the purpose of making it definite and certain as to what the Sherman antitrust law is considered to be. If we put in the bill a number of provisions which repeal the Sherman antitrust law, then we have repealed it pro tanto for the entire United States. We cannot repeal it for John Doe and leave it operative as to Richard Roe. I shall look more carefully at section 4. But if it conflicts with the antitrust laws it is highly important to know what we are doing.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. WHITE. I think whatever can be done as a matter of law, it is perfectly clear what the proponents of this measure are undertaking to do. They have undertaken to provide that a group of corporations shall subject themselves to a code, to particular provisions of law, which are entirely apart from and have no application to all the other citizens of the United States, and that to those who join the code and subject themselves as code members to rules and regulations, which have the force of law under this bill, the provisions of the Antitrust Act shall not apply. It is said that the provisions of the Antitrust Act shall apply to them unless they join the code and subject themselves to the provisions of the code. Whether they can do it or not may be a matter of discussion, but that is unquestionably the purpose of the proponents of the bill.

Mr. BORAH. I do not think the law can be suspended. We must either repeal it or change it, or it binds the people throughout the country. We cannot suspend its operation as to certain people. In my opinion that is a thing that cannot be done. At least it ought not to be done.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I should like to suggest, while it may not be an entire cure for the point raised by the Senator from Idaho, that if it were to read, "Any combination between producers, except that provided for in section 4, creating a marketing agency for the disposal of competitive coals" and so forth, it would to some extent relieve the objection which he raised. In other words, if the exception in section 4 were inserted after the word "producers", on page 46, line 24, so it would read, "Any combination between producers, except as provided in section 4, creating a marketing agency for the disposal of competitive coals" and so forth, every producer would come under section 4 and have to subscribe to certain fair-trade practices. I think that would materially reduce the objection. Does the Senator from Idaho think likewise?

Mr. BORAH. I think it would mollify it.

Mr. TYDINGS. In other words, instead of qualifying the whole Sherman Antitrust Act at the end of the paragraph and then making certain exceptions, it would read: "Any combination between producers, except as provided in section 4, creating a marketing agency", and so forth. This would bring the result which the sponsors of the bill desire without excepting anybody from the Sherman Antitrust Act.

Mr. BORAH. Then the language at the end of the paragraph should be stricken out:

> Unless such producers have accepted the code provided for in section 4 and shall comply with its provisions.

Then nobody would be exempted from the provisions of the code in a general way.

Mr. BARKLEY. The language in the first paragraph of section 12 is carried over from a bill passed in the last Congress. The following part of that amendment provides that with the permission of the commission marketing agencies may be set up and with the permission of the commission more than one producer may be permitted to use the same marketing agency under certain circumstances.

Mr. TYDINGS. I quite appreciate that, and that is what I am trying to work out. The Senator from Idaho brought out the point that the Sherman antitrust law in this case would be a criminal statute which would apply only to certain people. In view of the fact that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] has pointed out that these combinations can go on if they conform to certain trade practices which are already covered by the Sherman antitrust law, if the exception is made after the word "producers" instead of at the end of the paragraph, the Sherman antitrust law would still stand on the books, but those who comply with its provisions as set forth in section 4 would have the right to engage in the marketing and sale of coal as provided in this bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. As the antitrust law stands now, any such cooperation between producers or among producers who have the same marketing agency for the sale of their coal might be technically a violation of the antitrust law. The commission cannot permit them to use the identical marketing agencies unless they have become code members and have agreed to the code under which their transactions are regulated. If it is desired to provide in this bill that coal producers may, with the permission of the commission, use the same agency for the sale of their coal, under circumstances which the law presumes would be justified, and at the same time leave the antitrust law in effect so that such use and such cooperation would be regarded as a violation of the antitrust law, then we have nullified one of the main purposes of the bill.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator will recall the Appalachian Coal case in which the Supreme Court held that just such an agency as prescribed here was not within the Sherman antitrust law.

Mr. BARKLEY. It was not within it in that particular case, but it depended on the circumstances and practices involved in that case. It might not be identical as to marketing agencies, and they might not operate in the same fashion.

Mr. BORAH. If that is the desire of the Senator from Kentucky, why not say that the condition which is described in this language in the bill shall not be regarded as within the terms of the Sherman antitrust law?

Mr. BARKLEY. I am not particular about the language except that I do not want to try by this measure to hold out the hope that the coal producers may use the same agencies in a cooperative way for the disposition of their coal under terms that are agreed to by a commission which is supposed to be a public body and representing the public as well as the producers and miners, and then find that if they comply with that rule and abide by it they are at the same time guilty of a violation of the antitrust law.

Mr. BORAH. I cannot forget that when the bill first intruded its presence into this body it repealed the Sherman antitrust law as to coal, and, in my opinion, that is what is being accomplished here. It ought to be said in plain terms that the Sherman antitrust law is modified or repealed to a certain extent so that the people may act accordingly. There are other sales agencies than those relating to coal.

Mr. BARKLEY. This provision applies only to sales agencies for coal, and, even though it could be construed to repeal the antitrust law, it would only repeal it insofar as it applied to the coal industry, insofar as it applied to code members of the industry. It would have no effect whatever on the coal producers who were not members of the code.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator, of course, agrees that has the effect of taking the coal dealers of the United States from under the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law, while all other business people of the United States remain under the Sherman antitrust law.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; and even coal dealers and coal producers who would not come under the terms of the bill would still be under the provisions of the antitrust law. The language is supposed to be sufficiently comprehensive to affect the interests of the people sufficiently to do no harm by lifting the code members out from under its provisions.

Mr. BORAH. We must admit that what we are doing is to provide a different trust law for the coal operators and producers of the United States than we provide for all other people in the United States. It seems to me that is precisely what we are asked to do. I do not want to do that. Perhaps I cannot prevent it, but I must record my protest against placing a part of the people of the United States under the operations of a drastic law, while the rest of them, if they do a certain thing which is provided by the bill, may not be guilty of a violation of the law.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, does he not think the transportation of language as suggested by the Senator from Maryland a few moments ago would effect the purpose he desires? It seems to me it would.

Mr. BORAH. Has the clerk the language?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment suggested by the Senator from Maryland will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 46, line 24, after the word "producers", it is proposed to insert "except as provided for in section 4"; and on page 47, line 8, after the word "thereto", it is proposed to strike out "unless such producers have accepted the code provided for in section 4 and shall comply with its provisions."

Mr. BORAH. Will the clerk be kind enough to read the committee amendment as it would read with that amendment adopted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read, as requested.

The CHIEF CLERK. As proposed to be amended, section 12 would read:

Any combination between producers, except as provided for in section 4, creating a marketing agency for the disposal of competitive coals in interstate commerce or in intrastate commerce directly affecting interstate commerce in coal at prices to be determined by such agency——

Mr. BORAH. That is sufficient.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I desire to offer a perfecting amendment. I should like to strike out "section 4" and say "except as provided herein", so that in the event the code is in some other part of the bill the same result will be attained.

Mr. BARKLEY. Why not say "in this act"?

Mr. TYDINGS. Very well; "in this act."

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if it will not too greatly inconvenience the proponents of the bill, I should like to have an opportunity to go back and analyze section 4, where these exceptions are provided for, by tomorrow morning.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, there is no objection to this amendment going over until tomorrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be passed over.

Mr. TYDINGS. May I ask if the amendment is the pending business?

Mr. BORAH. It is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next amendment of the committee.

The next amendment was, in section 17, page 51, after line 17, to insert:

(e) The term "marketing agency" shall include any association of coal producers or any corporation or other joint enterprise whose stockholders or members are coal producers, which association, corporation, or other joint enterprise exercises the functions of marketing or distributing coal.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, subsection (f) of section 17 is one of the committee amendments to which the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] has offered an amendment; and I, therefore, suggest that subsection (f) go over until tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment designated as subsection (f) will be passed over. The clerk will state the next amendment of the committee.

The next amendment was, in section 17, page 52, after line 3, to insert:

(g) The term "antitrust laws of the United States" shall include the act of Congress of July 2, 1890, known as the "Sherman Act", and the act of Congress of October 15, 1914, known as the "Clayton Act", and acts amendatory and supplemental thereto.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 20, page 53, line 11, after the word "hereby", to strike out "authorized to be appropriated for the administration of this act" and insert "transferred and made available for the uses and during the periods for which appropriated, in the administration of this act by the National Bituminous Coal Commission and the office of the consumers' counsel herein created", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 20. (a) The Bituminous Coal Conservation Act of 1935 is hereby repealed, but such repeal shall not be effective until the consumers' counsel and a majority of the members of the Commission have been appointed.

(b) There is hereby authorized to be appropriated from time to time such sums as may be necessary for the administration of this act. All sums heretofore or hereafter appropriated or made available to the National Bituminous Coal Commission and to the consumers' counsel of the National Bituminous Coal Commission established under the Bituminous Coal Conservation Act of 1935 are hereby transferred and made available for the uses and during the periods for which appropriated, in the administration of this act by the National Bituminous Coal Commission and the office of the consumers' counsel herein created.

(c) The records, property, and equipment of the National Bituminous Coal Commission and the consumers' counsel, respectively, established under the Bituminous Coal Conservation Act of 1935 are hereby transferred to the commission and the consumers' counsel, respectively, established under this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Annex to act—Schedule of districts", on page 60, after line 12, to insert "All coal-producing counties in California", so as to make the paragraph read:

NEW MEXICO

District 18. The following counties in New Mexico: Grant, Lincoln, McKinley, Rio Arriba, Sandoval, San Juan, San Miguel, Santa Fe, Socorro.

The following counties in Arizona: Pinal, Navajo, Graham, Apache, Coconino.

All coal-producing counties in California.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That concludes the committee amendments not passed over.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. BARKLEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HERRING in the chair) laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting several nominations under the Works Progress Administration, which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE—POSTMASTER AT OSWEGO, N. Y.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Reports of committees are in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. From the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads I report back favorably the nomination of a postmaster in the State of New York and, at the request of the New York Senators, ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the nomination.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of James H. Mackin to be postmaster at Oswego, N. Y., in place of R. W. J. Mott.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the nomination? The Chair hears none, and, without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask that the President may be notified of the confirmation of the nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

If there be no further reports of committees, the clerk will state the first nomination in order on the calendar.

WORKS PROGRESS ADMINISTRATION

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Floyd Sharp to be State administrator in the Works Progress Administration for Arkansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that the nominations of postmasters on the calendar be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations of postmasters are confirmed en bloc.

That completes the Executive Calendar.

RECESS

The Senate resumed legislative session.

Mr. BARKLEY. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Thursday, April 1, 1937, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 31, 1937

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our Lord and Master, bow down Thine ear and let us breathe our prayer to a patient, loving Heavenly Father. We pray that these moments may not be shadowed by a passing cloud of doubt. Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on Thee. May we ponder this promise and revalue it in our hearts. The still, small voice is more commanding than the sound of many trumpets. Give us strength to master temptations and subdue fears. Bridge our faults and forgive our failures. Let Thy will be done; so often our wills are blind and erring and Thine is infinite in wisdom. O Lord God, make us worthy to come and go before our people as cleansing, uplifting forces for goodness; saturate us with balanced understanding, pulsating with light and brimming with a cheerful, joyous outlook. Bless our broad and growing country. May our national life be a song, a poem of human brotherhood, and free from unwelcome strife. We pray that all homes may burst into higher forms and glow in richer colors. In the name of our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 1397. An act to create a Federal Crop Insurance Corporation, and for other purposes.

PUBLIC POWER BLOC MEETING

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute in order to make an announcement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say to the members of our public power bloc that we are going to have a meeting on Friday night at 7:30, in room 356 of the old House Office Building, which is the Veterans' Committee room, at which time we will be addressed by Dr. R. H. Montgomery, of the University of Texas, a man who has put in more time studying the power question and the utilities question generally, and probably has more information on the subject than any other man in private life in America. I invite every Member of the House, including the Members of the minority, to be present.

THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

Mr. O'BRIEN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary may be permitted to sit during sessions of the House for the remainder of the week.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD at this point by including therein a joint resolution which I have introduced today.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution in relation to the power of the Federal and State courts to pass on the constitutionality of certain Federal statutes, and for other purposes

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by conventions in three-fourths of the several States:

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. No court of the United States, or of any State, shall declare unconstitutional or void any law passed by at least 60 percent of the Members of each House of Congress and approved by the President. All laws of the United States so enacted and so approved shall remain in full force and effect throughout the United States until similarly repealed or amended by a future session or sessions of the Congress and the President, or until vetoed or repudiated by the people through referendum vote.

"SEC. 2. Congress shall enact referendum election laws in order that the people of the various States may vote upon such acts of Congress."

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD by printing in the Appendix thereof a radio speech delivered by me last Saturday night.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

THE LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL, 1938

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5966) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 5966, with Mr. LUCAS in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD].

THE MARCH OF TIME

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, about a year ago I made certain remarks on this floor, taking as my theme the familiar phrase "Time marches on." In the intervening 12 months time has continued to march at a fast tempo, and certain men and events have moved furiously and far with it.

I now ask you to review some of those events with me, since the happenings of the present and the prospects for the future can always best be judged and measured by the events of the past.

In the days which preceded the election last November the most skillful spellbinder and politician that this country has probably ever known successfully persuaded the people that the New Deal was a great success and that he had saved the Nation from the actual chaos and ruin which he pictured as having existed at the time he took office on that much-mentioned March 4, 1933. In his harangues he assured the voters that the Nation had previously been under the complete control of business monopoly, financial monopoly, speculators, selfish and unscrupulous bankers, class antagonism, sectionalism, and war profiteers. He declared that in him these forces had met their match, and that they would, if he were reelected, meet their master. They were, he asserted, unanimous in their hatred for him, and he boldly declared, "I welcome their hatred." This appeal held the masses spellbound, as always, seemingly, does this age-old appeal. And all these challenges and assertions were uttered in a radio voice matchless for its diction and persuasive appeal. Forgotten or ignored were most of the views which he had held, most of the promises which he had made during the campaign 4 years previous. They had served their purpose and been discarded. Ignored was the fact that his acts had been in almost complete negation of the expressed views and pledges which had swept him into office previously. New lurking dangers were conjured up and millions were convinced that they existed, even though they had not previously even imagined their existence.

He called the "roll of honor" of those who had stood with him 4 years before, conveniently forgetting, however, certain rather notable recalcitrants. Soon, as he doubtless expected, millions more were to be added to that honor list—millions who had received assistance, at enormous cost to the Federal Treasury. On this additional roll were to be countless home owners, who had received at least temporary relief by a transfer of their mortgages to the Government; a host of farmers, who had been given billions in largesses and actually paid to remove land from production; millions who had directly or indirectly benefited by payments for so-called made work.

He found in the accomplishments, through which this new honor roll had been created, a cause for boasting, but ignored the fact that he had also piled up evidences of national debt—which he had himself so severely criticized in 1932—to the staggering amount of $13,000,000,000, of which less than two billion is actually recoverable. I would remind you that these evidences of debt can properly be called by no other name than postponed taxes.

However, he was swept back into office with such a majority that perhaps it is small wonder that he seems now to have lost his power to restrain himself.

Time marches on. Following the election, the Congress convened early in January. The President appeared in person to deliver his message. He spoke persuasively, as always, but in terms which were widely described as vague and general. There was less of the prima donna in it. He thanked the Congress for its cooperation during the previous 4 years. Inwardly he must have been chuckling when he said that. Of course, no fully informed person could have claimed that during that period the Congress was other than a rubber stamp approving all suggestions. He requested—and unquestionably expects—that this kind of cooperation be continued. He painted a glowing picture of the needs of additional slum clearance, the creation of new opportunities for recreation and culture, further rehabilitation of the farmers, and the ownership of land by tenant farmers, and continued large contributions for work relief to the needy. Many of these utopian objectives were, of course, commendable per se. Yet he failed to mention the more and more billions which would have to be provided by the Treasury and, eventually, by the Nation's already overburdened taxpayers in order to accomplish these aims.

He expressed a desire to control overproduction, underproduction, and speculation; but more utopian ideals which could be achieved, if at all, only by further huge subsidies. All this occurred less than 3 months ago, at which time he must have known, or should have known, that the destructive forces of inflation, due largely to the huge borrowings already made, were creating an immediately dangerous condition.

At this point I call attention to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM]. The greatest eulogy ever pronounced on a human being was perhaps pronounced by him, and yet he carefully informed the President that probably future cooperation was not to be had. It was a marvelous speech, and I congratulate the gentleman from Virginia. Few could have made it, and he did it splendidly; but I think the message that he intended to convey to the President was unmistakable. We shall hold the gentleman to it.

At the same time he made merely a broad hint that only "an enlightened view with reference to the Constitution" was needed. There was nothing in that statement to cause alarm to anyone, and it left the Nation wholly unprepared for the bombshell which was to be thrown so soon after. We felt that he was still of the same mind that he had seemingly been last November and that he had then been sincere in his declaration that only a clarifying amendment would be sought should that be found necessary.

Perhaps part of the fault was ours. We should have read behind that broad smile of confidence, bred of the mandate given him in reelection. We should have applied the yardstick of very recent history to his statement, and borne in mind the fact that for the 4 years just ended we had not had a government of the people or by the people, but merely "for" the people. It should have been obvious to us by that time that, in his mind, a government "for" the people as conceived and carried out by him constitutes the real democracy. One may compare it with the phrase employed by Mussolini, "If by democracy you mean government for, and in the interests of, the people, then our system—and ours alone—is truly democratic."

Doubtless there are such conceptions of democracy; honest ones. But they are not those of our forefathers who created our form of government.

Time marches on.

A few days later the Budget message was sent up to us. It created widespread interest for it evidenced the fact that the President now had a $7,000,000,000 Government permanently established. That Budget message revealed that, due to the large revenues from imposts on liquor—acquired during his administration—and many other new forms of taxes imposed during that period, the national receipts might reach a total of seven and three-tenths billions in the fiscal year of 1938. However, it likewise made certain that—if further relief funds were to be appropriated to the amount of one and one-half billions, as suggested—the minimum necessary—and all or any of his proposed new ventures were to be financed, another large deficit was certain. And certainly no provision was made for even the beginning of the reduction of the present enormous debt.

Apparently there was a ready acknowledgment of the fact that all which had been done had failed miserably to solve the problem of unemployment, or even materially to reduce the number of the unemployed. But it came to the people of the Nation as a great shock to learn the plain and unpleasant truth that not only would the present oppressively high taxes continue to prevail, but that they must be further increased.

Although business ratios had returned to nearly normal, there was no encouraging suggestion forthcoming that we might now begin to save something against another possible depression. Rather we were told that the Government expenses would now remain constant, at this new high point. The recently recruited huge army of Federal job holders seems now to be a permanent organization, to be paid by the contributions of the helpless, hapless taxpayers.

Nothing changes the affections like an empty treasury or pocketbook and I here call the attention of your Commander in Chief, when you have no more money as was suggested by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] yesterday, to the old illustration. After having been married for 4 years the husband said, "There was something about me that you did like, wasn't there?" "Yes", she replied, "there was." And he said, "Yes, I know it, but I have spent it all."

Time marches on.

Shortly thereafter another message, containing the greatest demand of individual power ever made on the Congress by any Chief Executive and fraught with most serious consequences, came up in the form of the Brownlow report, so-called. It contained what is, in effect, a demand that the Executive should have an absolutely free hand in the expenditure of governmental funds by the abolition of the office of Comptroller General, the one official heretofore representing the control of Congress over the funds appropriated by it.

COMMENT ON WOODRUM REMARKS

This report also suggests that the President should have full authority to do exactly as his own will and desires may dictate with all independent commissions and other similar governmental agencies. The suggestion of such a surrender of absolute power by the Congress to the Executive is not only untenable but there are the gravest doubts as to the constitutionality of such a procedure. That is, if we are to continue to live under the Constitution as America has known it.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM]—and I congratulate him—said yesterday:

> The Comptroller General is an agent of the Congress and under no circumstances should this House ever consent to weaken or disarm the agency of the Comptroller General of the United States.

And that is the chief thing the President asked for in the Brownlow report.

While corrective measures are, from time to time, desirable and necessary and there is unquestionably a great deal that should be done, it would be a highly dangerous proceeding for the Congress to hand over such absolute power to act in this matter to an Executive who has shown himself to be so careless of expenditures—and of his own earlier promises to reduce governmental bureaus and commissions. We know how such agencies have been spawned during the past 4 years.

When the Members of Congress are fully awakened to what this proposal really means, even those who are now primarily stirred up by the President's Supreme Court proposal are likely to exclaim, "We ain't seen nothing yet."

Time marches on.

Now another message is received by the Congress, accompanied by a letter from the Attorney General. Therein appeared the startling allegations that at least six of our Supreme Court Justices were afflicted with hardening of the arteries; that they were living wholly in the past and were hence unable to visualize the present or explore the future. It was further alleged that the Court was behind in its work and that more and younger members were needed in order that the docket might be cleared. This latter claim by the Attorney General, at least, has already been amply refuted and it is now generally accepted that the Court is fully abreast of its work.

This arrogant demand that he be allowed to pack the Supreme Court staggered the Nation.

Hosts of his former supporters roar their disapproval. Does he hear? Will he be deterred from this madness?

No man could accept, no man can resign without suspicion of predetermined opinions and subservience to the appointing power. No Justice could now resign and retain respect.

Time marches on.

And now comes the famous $100-a-plate dinner. Once more loyal Democrats were assessed heavily for the plums which had been handed them. There, surrounded by idolatrous friends and hopeful partisans, the President rose to remarkable heights of oratory. The mask fell off entirely. His long-pent-up hatred for the Supreme Court burst forth in fury. Others before him have yielded to the intoxication of rhetorical moments, spurred on by applause. So it was now with him. However, when his words were later read by the cool light of reason, and carefully analyzed, many a reader decided that the whole speech should properly be consigned to the wastebasket labeled "balderdash."

A host of even his warmest friends realized that, although the dust bowl might be blowing now, that although the floods might be upon us now, that although many of our people might still be ill clad, ill fed, and ill housed now, still all these regrettable things had no real connection with the Supreme Court. It would be no more illogical to assert that the President himself was personally responsible for all those things—floods, destruction, ruin. Has he not been in power while they were occurring? We cannot forget that a former President was blamed, by many, as personally responsible for America's share in a world-wide depression, which was as much due to economic forces as these newer catastrophes have been caused by natural ones.

Certainly they cannot, with propriety, be used as an excuse for the rape of our Supreme Court, now the one coordinate part of the Federal Government which has, throughout our history, been held in almost unswervingly high regard by the American people. History records that the criticism of Presidents and of the legislative body has been frequent and often bitter. But only in the rarest instances have the people themselves expressed fears regarding their Supreme Court. Disrespect for law is the father of anarchy. Law is not a static thing. It is essentially a thing of steady growth and change, but that it does this slowly makes for strength. It has well been compared to a sturdy tree which spreads its branches protectingly in all directions. But if you try to force its growth, artificially like a hothouse plant, you will assuredly get a spindling thing, without vigor, without power to endure.

This President of ours will undoubtedly go down in history as one who has done much that is good—and as one who had done more harm than any other that has held that office. And the greatest injury to the Nation's "moral climate", which he has thus far occasioned, is his unwarranted attack upon the Court, since it has disturbed the confidence of the uninstructed masses in our form of government.

Then the Nation was regaled by another of the famous fireside chats. But such a storm of protest and criticism had been stirred up by the victory-dinner speech that this one was delivered in a vastly different tone. It has rightly been characterized as the "wheedling speech."

The three branches of our Government were likened to three horses plowing a furrow. But most people quickly realized which one of the three was a bucking bronco, who meant to force the other two horses to plow the furrow exactly where, exactly in the direction, and to the exact depth that he desired. He complained that any clarifying amendment to the Constitution would take a considerable time to enact. In this was a plain hint that we must act now, while the Nation has a President so capable, so intelligent, so willing, so versed in economic conditions, so brave, so strong against the forces of greed that it would be unwise to leave anything to be achieved by his successor in the office, whoever he might be.

However, this is essentially something for the Democratic Party to determine, since it is in such complete control of the Congress. It must assume full responsibility either for checking these vaulting desires for power or permitting him to carry on according to his will or whim. The Republicans cannot be charged with the responsibility and must acknowledge that they can do little except point out the dangers to our Republic and our democracy.

Time marches on.

Another astounding message came to us from Governor Eccles, of the Federal Reserve Board—the man who had endorsed and encouraged spending to get us out of the pains of deflation, but he had gone so far that even he and others of the administration startled the country by saying, "Thus far and no farther." There are to be no more borrowings, as that would be highly dangerous, and we agree with him; and in my remarks the other day I went into that matter so completely that I shall not repeat. I again appreciate the time has now arrived even when the great spenders see the danger.

Time marches on.

Anarchy is abroad in the land. Law and order and government itself are challenged by one group of our citizens. A new dictator appears on the scene, directing the lives of millions of workers by his dictates affecting the industrial life of the whole Nation. He wields more power—and wields it more ruthlessly—than ever did any so-called monarch of industry. It is a repetition of what has happened often in history. A group, once small and feeble, through a valiant and praiseworthy fight, lasting for centuries, wins its way from serfdom to freedom and gains for itself many things which it fully deserved to have. But comes the time when it has become so powerful that it feels it can make use of a reminiscent phrase regarding those whom it considers to be its opponents, "They have met their match. Now they will meet their master."

I held a picture of that ruthless dictator up before you one day here, and I asked you then, did I not, whether he appeared to you like a man to whom you could sing a lullaby?

To this group the new dictator's word is law. By their almost unanimous votes, and a campaign contribution of nearly a half a billion dollars, he had helped to elect the President last fall. He had waited for but 1 day after the inauguration to begin his demands for what amounted to payment for services rendered. At that time the President cleverly sidestepped, replying that it was "no time for headlines." Then followed the statement made by one of his own Cabinet, who must be regarded as his spokesman in the matter, who said in effect that it had not yet been determined whether a sit-down strike had a legalistic status or not. The words are equivocable, but the implication at that time and under those circumstances was unmistakable. The strikers in Michigan had still green in their memory the speech which the President made in Detroit before election. There he raised the issue of class antagonism and alined himself with labor, begging the support of its dictatorial leader. How could they have done otherwise than believe that they were now free to go to extreme lengths in an effort to accomplish their aims without having much to fear from the Federal Government?

Of late we must have been reminded of the familiar expression, "He sowed the wind; now he is reaping the whirlwind."

Industry has been forced to grant the many new demands of labor, imposed by strikes which have increased appallingly in number and extent since the year 1933, but in so doing has advanced prices and will probably make even greater, temporary, profits than before. Its leaders realize, however, that the end—an end which cannot be contemplated with equanimity—is now in sight. Collective bargaining has become generally accepted. It is certainly a necessary right of labor. But when large masses of our workers are persuaded, or commanded, to pursue their demands by methods subversive and illegal, all law-abiding citizens must anxiously await word from the President on the subject and a frank expression of his intentions in the matter. Especially should this be expected from one who claims a mandate from the people so great that he has felt justified in demanding for himself more and more power to act in every field as heretofore pointed out.

Is he lacking in courage at this critical moment?

This present silence on his part is, indeed, ominous. We have been patient during the recent days of anxious waiting, hoping that the President would ponder and make a decision. May we hope for some such courageous statement as was made under like conditions by Grover Cleveland and Theodore Roosevelt. Democracy? Ah! It has been said—and we are beginning to realize the full significance of the statement—that if Grover Cleveland was a Democrat he was everything that this President is not. Their viewpoint and their actions are diametrically opposite on all matters of grave public importance. The President has not heretofore been lacking in courage and a readiness to challenge those who differ with him. In the present critical conditions of lawlessness—conditions acclaimed by Communists, Socialists, and others of the left wing—the President has his great opportunity. Will he seize it? We await his decision. We can only exclaim, "Fire-side when ready, Mr. President." [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HARLAN].

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, if it were not for the fact that I wish to enjoy the unusual pleasure of addressing this House on a question, for which I will ask unanimous consent, I might suggest in answer to the last statement by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD] that if Abraham Lincoln were a Republican, practically every Republican President since, except Theodore Roosevelt, has been anything else.

The thing I wanted to talk about, however, is the subject of war debts.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARLAN. When I have finished.

Mr. GIFFORD. No. Will the gentleman yield right now?

Mr. HARLAN. I cannot.

Mr. GIFFORD. Abraham Lincoln is accepted by the Republican Party.

Mr. HARLAN. I trust that will not be taken out of my time.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] spoke the other day on the question of war debts. I should like to talk a little bit about the proposition that he raised at that time, but before that I should like to talk a little on the subject of bargains and spending money.

Two or three centuries ago we are told that our ancestors bought Manhattan Island for two barrels of whisky. That was a pretty good bargain in those days. A little later we bought the Louisiana Purchase for 4 cents an acre. That was also a pretty good bargain. Seventy years ago yesterday we bought Alaska for $7,000,000. Will Rogers made the statement just before he died that comparing the value of Alaska with the value of Manhattan Island, the Indians were considerably overpaid.

About 17 or 18 years ago we bought at the price of $11,000,000,000 a piece of education for 130,000,000 people that was a far bigger bargain than any of those I have mentioned. When you can teach 130,000,000 people that an amateur has no business sitting down in a poker game with no limit, with experts, you have certainly purchased some education. That is the lesson we learned at the close of the World War. At least, I hope we learned it. If we never recover a dime of that $11,000,000,000, we have made a very good purchase even as it is, because I hope that on Armistice Day from now on we have some speaker recall to our public mind just what we did when we began to tamper with European nations when they are trying to stir up trouble among themselves.

That has evidently persuaded us that we must preserve our neutrality. We have passed a neutrality bill which will undoubtedly become law, in some form or other, as an earnest endeavor to keep out of European quarrels. That, however, is going to add an additional cost to us. We cannot take the position in this world of not selling anything to any foreign country when they are engaged in war without facing the immediate possibility of other countries retaliating and refusing to sell to us in case we are involved in war. That is just one of the costs we are going to have to pay for neutrality. Self-preservation and reasonable foresight tell us to lay by stores of those things which we will need in time of war, that we do not have now, in anticipation of an international embargo against us. That is only one of the things we are going to have to pay for neutrality. I have before me a list of 23 articles that we must have in the event of war, beginning with aluminum and ending with wool. Of those 23 articles a number are nonperishable; that is, articles that can be stored and can be kept. Those articles are produced very largely among countries that are our present debtors. By our tariff policy and by our mistake in granting a moratorium, we have given European countries, particularly France, a fine excuse for not paying us anything. They say, "You put up a tariff wall that kept our goods out. You granted a moratorium to Germany without consulting us, embarrassing us financially, so that we cannot pay." Those two things are the excuses. However, weighted against these mistakes on our part we have made two great concessions to the European countries. In the first place, we cut down their amortized debt about 50 percent. That ought to be some concession for some of our mistakes. In the second place, we devalued our gold dollar, which cut it almost down half again. So that if those European countries have been wronged by our tariff policy or if they have been wronged by our adopting a moratorium against German debts without consulting France, we have certainly paid, and the thing ought to be on an even basis now.

If they have any intention of paying these debts at any time, if we can make it possible for them to do so without a serious drain upon themselves, I submit that there is no legitimate excuse that can be advanced at this time.

The gentleman from Illinois the other day suggested to this body that our tourists buy their foreign exchange in this country, and that we then should take that fund that the tourists expend in their trips abroad and allow the foreign nations to apply that on their obligations to us. He said that that would not interfere with our industries here at home, because it would not necessitate importing any commodities and it would not mean transferring any money from the foreign countries. Unfortunately, Mr. Chairman, the result of that policy would be to deprive our American exporters of $500,000,000 annually with which our American exporters are paid; so that, so far as affecting this country is concerned, it would have exactly the same effect as if we had simply bought their goods. In one case it would throw our workers out of a job if the goods were manufactured in competition with foreign importations, and in the other case it would throw our workers out of a job if they were employed in the manufacture of goods for export. Thus I cannot agree with the gentleman on that proposition.

Let us, however, return to these goods that we need in the conduct of war. We could well afford to propose to European countries that they send us such things as aluminum, chromium, ferromanganese, mica, nickel, nux vomica, opium, optical glass, rubber, quicksilver, tin, and tungsten. All of these things we need just as much as we need battleships, because they are indispensable. They will keep indefinitely.

Great Britain produces aluminum, ferromanganese, mica, nickel, nux vomica, optical glass, quinine, rubber, tin, and tungsten. France produces chromium and nux vomica. Italy produces quicksilver. Yugoslavia produces opium. Russia produces mica. All of these commodities, with the possible exception of rubber, are capable of being stored indefinitely, and we could even use rubber without disturbing our present industrial imports by exchanging the supply in the Government warehouse with the industrial users at convenient intervals, thus keeping the Federal supply constantly fresh and the industrial demand constant. The best information available to me is that raw rubber can be stored for a period of 6 years without deterioration. This Government could afford to agree to take those things, not use them in industry at all, but store them in this country. If we did not use them in industry, it would not interfere with normal imports from those countries.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 additional minutes to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HARLAN. These materials could be stored in warehouses. Their importation would not disturb normal international trade or exchange. They would not interfere with foreign trade at all, because we would not use them in industrial processes. It would give us protection in time of war that we do not have now, and it would protect us in a most vulnerable spot. It would also, in fact, be a help to some of these foreign countries, because these commodities are produced in the dominions of Great Britain and France, and it would stimulate their local trade in the home countries. It would have the effect in those countries of keeping their industries going.

Now, if there is any intention on the part of these foreign countries to do anything but welsh on their debts after we have cut their debts in half by reducing their interest rates and their amortization charges, after we have again reduced them almost another half by devaluing our gold coin—if they do not show intention to comply with as reasonable a proposition as this, it seems to be that the deductions are obvious.

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARLAN. I yield.

Mr. COLDEN. The gentleman in the earlier part of his remarks spoke about real-estate investments this country had made. I wonder if it would not be a good settlement of the war debts to secure some of the real estate owned by these foreign nations in the Americas.

Mr. HARLAN. Our experience with foreign possessions has been of such a nature that it is questionable. If we could take the real estate without taking the people on it, it would be all right. Unfortunately, when we come to mixing other races with our institutions, it does not work.

Mr. COLDEN. How about the Bahamas and the Bermudas—land like that?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LANZETTA].

Mr. LANZETTA. Mr. Chairman, on the 11th day of February 1937 I introduced bill H. R. 4634, to amend the Naturalization Act of June 29, 1906, and provide for the admission to citizenship of aliens who came into this country prior to February 5, 1917. The bill reads as follows:

That the second paragraph of section 4 of the Naturalization Act of June 29, 1906 (34 Stat. 596), as amended (U. S. C., Supp. VI, title 8, sec. 402), is amended as follows: "Provided further, That where an alien who came into the United States of America prior to February 5, 1917, for permanent residence, has filed a declaration of intention or a declaration of intention and petition for naturalization before the passage of this amendment, and who is now 50 years of age or over he may upon petition or application be admitted to citizenship, the expiration of the time limit of 7 years from the date of filing his declaration of intention notwithstanding, where such expiration was due to the alien's inability to qualify for citizenship because of lack of knowledge of the English language, or lack of knowledge of the laws of the United States of America, or lack of education, and such alien shall not be required to sign the petition or application in his own handwriting."

The purpose of this bill is to amend the present naturalization laws so as to admit to citizenship persons who came to the United States prior to February 5, 1917, and who have failed to qualify for citizenship because they lack the educational requirements as prescribed by the present law.

Before the passage of the Immigration Act of February 5, 1917, our immigration laws did not provide for any literacy test, and aliens were admitted into the United States without regard to their educational qualifications. As a result thousands of immigrants who came to our shores lacked even a primary education. These men and women who came to make their way into the new world were in most cases persons of mature age, and they were compelled because of necessity to engage in gainful occupations soon after their arrival. Thereafter the burden of providing for themselves and families left them very little time to acquire the necessary knowledge of our language and our institutions to admit them to citizenship.

It is a fact that there are today thousands of persons who have lived in the United States 20, 30, and 40 years or more, and who are still unable to speak and understand the English language sufficiently and intelligently to meet the educational requirements of citizenship. In most cases these men and women have severed all relationships with their mother country so that in truth and in fact this country is their country. Many of their children have honorably served this country during the World War and have reached high stations in life. To continue to deprive them of the right to become American citizens solely because of their educational deficiencies is tantamount to exiling them from the country where they have lived the greater part of their lives, whose laws they have obeyed and upheld, whose taxes they have helped to pay, and to whose material wealth they have substantially contributed. They love this country because it means everything to them—liberty, freedom, family, friends, peace, and security.

The men and women included in this legislation are persons of 50 years of age or more, who have already declared their intentions to become American citizens and who have made every effort within their power to comply with the educational requirements of our naturalization laws. Because of their advanced years and lack of even a primary education in most cases, they have now reached a stage where no amount of preparation or schooling will enable them to pass satisfactorily the tests which they must undergo before they can become citizens. It is reasonable to assume that if they have been unable to acquire the necessary knowledge for citizenship during their early years of life that they will never be able to do so in their declining years.

Unless our present naturalization laws are amended as suggested in my bill, these men and women will never become American citizens. In view of this impasse, is it just and fair for a true and free democracy, such as this Government of ours, to insist upon certain educational requirements as a condition precedent to granting the full protection of its laws to persons who by their every act during their long residence in this country, have shown themselves fit and most anxious to become its loyal citizens?

Mr. Chairman, February 5, 1917, is not an arbitrary date chosen at random. It is the date which marked a definite change in the immigration policies of this country. It was then for the first time that our immigration laws imposed educational requirements upon aliens coming into the United States. Under the Immigration Act of February 5, 1917, aliens over the age of 16 who cannot read or write the English language, or some other language or dialect, are excluded. Since the enactment of this law no alien has been admitted to the United States who did not have at least a primary education.

To allay the fears of those who may feel that by the passage of this amendment to our naturalization laws, our standards of citizenship would be lowered for all times, it is pointed out that the group of aliens who stand to benefit by this legislation is definite in number and is limited by three very important requirements: First, that they must be 50 years of age or over; second, that they must have come into the United States prior to February 5, 1917; and third, that they must have filed their declarations of intention to become American citizens prior to the passage of this amendment.

The provision in this bill that an applicant from this limited group of aliens shall not be required to sign the petition or application for admission to citizenship in his own handwriting, is not a new one in our naturalization laws. The Naturalization Act of June 29, 1906, section 4, second paragraph, contained a similar provision which applied to persons who had filed their declarations of intention before the passage of that act. Congress at that time was confronted with the same situation which we are faced with today, i. e., whether the right to citizenship should be further denied to aliens who had been welcomed with open arms and who had been permitted to enter the United States without as much as having to sign their names.

Mr. Chairman, if the Fifty-ninth Congress, in all its wisdom, saw fit to suspend certain educational requirements in our naturalization laws by the act of June 29, 1906, so as to admit to citizenship that group of aliens who had entered this country under the same conditions as the aliens included in my bill, H. R. 4634, let the Members of the Seventy-fifth Congress likewise do justice to this present group of men and women who also entered the United States at a time when our immigration laws did not provide for any literacy test.

Mr. KENNEDY of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANZETTA. I yield.

Mr. KENNEDY of New York. I know we have all enjoyed the talk the gentleman has just made. I am wondering whether he has had an opportunity of compiling any figures as to the number of aliens who might be eligible under his amendment?

Mr. LANZETTA. I never had that opportunity. I might say to the gentleman from New York that I do not imagine the figures would be much over 50,000.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANZETTA. I yield.

Mr. MEAD. Along that line, I believe it would be interesting to compile a list of those mentioned in the gentleman's bill who had children in the service during the World War. It is my opinion that he would find that about 75 percent of that 50,000 he talks about are parents of war veterans.

Mr. LANZETTA. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] such time as he may desire.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, when the Ohio River reached the highest flood stage in its history recently and destroyed hundreds of millions of dollars worth of property, it made the entire country flood conscious and brought forth a host of suggestions as to how floods might be controlled. Two flood-control ideas have been emphasized. One is the engineering idea of bigger and better levees so that floodwaters might be hastened on their journey to the sea. The other is the idea of upstream engineering, reservoirs, and reforestation so that heavy rainfall and melting snows might be fixed in the soils by interception, by trees and vegetative cover, and thus slowed in its run-off into the watercourses. These two philosophies of flood control are of more than academic interest to the people of Illinois because the future flood-control policies to be applied in the Illinois Valley will determine the ultimate fate of that valley and of the Illinois River. The time has arrived when it must be determined once and for all whether bigger and better levees are to be built along the Illinois River at public expense to control floodwaters and protect a few hundred thousand acres of leveed bottom lands, or whether these lands should be taken over by the Federal Government once and for all as flood-reservoir areas, thereby also restoring these lands for fish and game purposes and making the Illinois Valley what it once was—one of the greatest outdoor recreation spots in the entire country.

Let it be said at the outset that the question of navigation is not involved in this matter. The Illinois River has already been made a part of the inland waterway system and deepened to give the channel a mean depth of 9 feet. Dams have been authorized, and are now in process of construction, whereby an adequate depth for navigation purposes will be maintained after January 1, 1938, when the diversion of water from Lake Michigan by the Sanitary District of Chicago will be reduced to 1,500 cubic feet per second. That whole program is being carried out as decreed by the Supreme Court of the United States so that the navigation question is in nowise involved. I want that fact emphasized so that nobody will be under any misapprehension on that score.

Now, let us dispassionately consider the past, present, and future of the Illinois River and its relation to the people of the State, for, after all, they are the real parties in interest.

The State of Illinois was once part of a vast area in the Northwest, including Canada, which belonged to France. In 1763 this vast region, including what is now our State of Illinois, was ceded by France to Great Britain. Later this same area, with the exception of Canada, became a part of the United States. In 1787, just 150 years ago, it was organized into what is known as the Northwest Territory. It included what is now the area embraced by the States of Illinois, Wisconsin, Indiana, Michigan, and Ohio. The Continental Congress adopted what is known as the Ordinance of 1787 for the government of this domain, and article IV of that ordinance provided that—

> Navigable waters leading into the Mississippi and St. Lawrence Rivers and the carrying places between the same shall be common highways and forever free as well to the inhabitants of the said Territory as to the citizens of the United States.

In 1800, by act of Congress, the Northwest Territory was divided and the Territory of Indiana was created, of which the area now embraced in the State of Illinois was a part; in 1809 the Territory of Illinois was created. In 1818 Illinois was admitted to the Union as a State.

It is about 385 miles long, has an area of 35,667,520 acres, and has a river system consisting of about 280 streams, the largest of which is the Illinois River. This river drains about 42 percent of the entire area of the State.

This beautiful river is about 273 miles in length, and traverses the State diagonally. In those early days it was a great fish-producing stream. In its natural state it was pure and clean and unpolluted by sewage. Not only was it a great stream for commercial fishing but for outdoor sports as well. Older folks will remember with much pleasure the days when one could fish up and down this river and catch a mess of fish with a plain willow fishing pole. Along this river old and young alike could find recreation and indulge the natural instinct of pursuit. The bottom lands were a veritable labyrinth of brush, copsewood, lakes, and clear, quiet pools where the people could spend quiet days and get away from the artificialities of the city. In those days our citizens could venture forth and shoot an occasional mess of mallards, teal, bluebills, and canvasback without fear of trespassing upon private property and without fear of setting foot on land that was protected by a Federal injunction. Those were happy days indeed, and hundreds of thousands of our citizens disported themselves along this vast, natural recreation ground in the Illinois Valley and found communion with Nature.

Those who engaged in fishing as a commercial enterprise found the Illinois River a real fish-producing stream. The report of the Bureau of Fisheries of the United States for 1899 indicates that the catch for that year was 14,775,915 pounds. This catch included varieties of which we no longer hear in our valley. There was crappie and drum, eels and black bass, carp and buffalo, sunfish and catfish, pike and pickerel, paddlefish and hickory shad, rock bass and white bass, sturgeon and frogs, perch and turtle, terrapin, and a host of others.

In those days we had an abundance of fish because there was a place for fish to spawn and reproduce. In the 400,000 acres of bottom land along the river were quiet pools, shaded ponds and sloughs refreshed from year to year as the spring rise flowed into these places. In and around these pools was an abundance of natural feed, not only for fish but for ducks and geese and other wild fowl. Wild rice, duckweed, pickerel weed, and other varieties of vegetation grew in great profusion. So attractive was this vast natural outdoor playground that thousands of people from adjoining States were in the habit of finding their recreation along the Illinois River, and even President Grant was attracted to Spring Lake, in the lower end of Tazewell County, by the outdoor delights which were afforded. To men whose only interest is in land this paradise might be considered as a "frog pond", but to hundreds of thousands of our people it represented a place to go to wash out the imperfections of the spirit and find surcease from the mad rush of the world.

Then things began to happen to our river—your river and mine. In 1899 the Legislature of Illinois permitted the Sanitary District of Chicago to flush its sewage into the river, and in a few years it became a living sewer, a breeder and carrier of disease, a slithery ribbon of water that was filled with the domestic and industrial waste of the cities which were established along the river. Sewage developed gas, which took the oxygen out of the water and began to destroy fish life. Only the hardier types of scavenger fish, principally carp, could endure; and little by little we witnessed a virtual destruction of the commercial fishing and a destruction of the recreational fishing and facilities in this river. Sewage, the great destroyer, made it abhorrent to man and fish alike.

Then came another destructive factor. As far back as the Civil War small levees not much larger than sweetpotato ridges had been built with team and scraper to keep the water out of some of the bottom lands in the spring so that limited areas might be farmed. There was, however, no concerted effort at systematic reclamation of these bottom lands for farming purposes until about 1904. From that time on drainage districts were organized up and down the river so that the lands and lakes which constituted the recreation grounds for our people might be given over to the plow. Engineers were employed to survey these lands so that they might be organized into districts under the State laws, bonds were issued to raise money with which to build huge earthen levees, dig ditches, and erect pumping stations, and in the space of a few years 201,000 acres—more than one-half of all the bottom lands in the Illinois Valley—were nestling behind levees. Today there are 332 miles of such levees and 376 miles of open ditches to make possible the tilling of these rich alluvial lands. Landowners were assessed for a total of almost $12,000,000 so that these bottom lands might be reclaimed, and it is estimated that the value of these lands, with their improvements, will aggregate about $23,000,000.

Now, consider the result of this program of pollution and reclamation which has been under way these last 38 years.

For practical purposes, fishing has been virtually destroyed. Where the annual commercial catch was nearly 15,000,000 pounds in 1899, it went down to 4,853,925 pounds in 1931, and it is fair to assume that year after year the catch will become smaller. Once our river was second to the Columbia River as a fish-producing stream. Today the Columbia River continues to increase its yield of fish, while the Illinois River continues to decrease its yield. Think of the hundreds of commercial fishermen who have thereby been deprived of a livelihood and think of the thousands of our citizens who can no longer find outdoor pleasure in the reaches of our once majestic river. More and more our people must journey long distances into Wisconsin, Michigan, and elsewhere to find a bit of recreation with a fishing rod and pay heavily for the pleasure. Those quiet pools where fish could spawn are gone. They are now given to the production of grain, and there is little hope, under existing conditions, for a restoration of fish life such as the adults of this generation knew when they were in knee pants.

Gradually the natural wild feed on which the wild fowl subsisted has been destroyed and is in process of complete extinction. There are ducks in our Illinois Valley in season, but they are seemingly not meant for the common folks. These ducks must be lured by feeding, as evidenced by the thousands of dollars' worth of corn that is fed every year by the hunting preserves up and down the river. Virtually every spot of any consequence where our people might bag a few ducks now and then has been converted into a private duck preserve, where memberships run high and exclusive. The public is virtually denied the opportunity to indulge the sport of hunting wild fowl, and in a little while this, too, will be an extinct pleasure. It will be little more than a memory.

And what has been the aggregate benefit of this program of reclamation and pollution for which so heavy a price has been paid in the form of destruction of our wildlife and outdoor recreation in the Illinois Valley? Excluding the East Peoria Drainage District, which is in reality a community rather than a drainage district now, there are slightly more than 3,000 residents in these drainage districts who make a rather precarious living from the land. I say precarious because there is the ever-present menace of floodwaters and the continual assessment for repairs to levees and pumping stations and the need for cleaning ditches and installing tile. I say percarious because nobody, not even the most versatile engineer, can foretell when heavy rains will send the river to flood stage and menace lives and property in these districts. As evidence of this fact, think of the assurances that were given to people in the Ohio Valley year in and year out that a perfect system of flood control was in operation and that by no conceivable means could there be such floods as were experienced in the past. Then comes Nature, as she did in 1937, to take back what was snatched from her and sends a flood that went to the highest stage in the history of that river and played havoc to the extent of an estimated billion dollars or more. Then comes the inevitable assault upon the Federal Treasury for funds with which to build higher and stronger levees, for funds with which to carry on relief, for funds with which to rehabilitate stricken homes and business enterprises, for funds with which to rebuild roads and bridges. These funds come from the pockets of the taxpayers in the form of direct or hidden taxes, and therefore it must be apparent that the citizen who pays taxes has more than a casual interest in this matter.

In the Illinois Valley we have had recurring floods. Extremely high water was recorded in 1904, 1913, 1922, 1926, and 1927. As more lands were leveed, the flood menace increased. Until 1902 but 22,000 acres were leveed. Then came the floods. In 1922, 90,000 acres of leveed lands were inundated. In 1927, 105,000 acres were flooded, and who shall say when the next flood will occur?

Let me emphasize that floods are of more than academic concern to the taxpayers. As a taxpayer you may live a thousand miles from a flooded area, but you help pay the bill. The landowners in the drainage districts that are flooded are not the only parties in interest. Whenever the Congress of the United States appropriates money for relief of flooded areas or for the building or enlarging of levees, that money comes from the general funds of the Government and is raised in the form of income taxes and general taxes of all kinds, both direct and indirect.

With that in mind, let us look at the cost of reclamation in the Illinois Valley. Since 1900 the Federal Government has expended $1,550,000 for flood control. This does not include $18,563,894 expended for navigation, nor does it include $8,292,582 for the Illinois-Michigan Canal. The State of Illinois and local subdivisions have in that time expended $7,100,000 out of the general revenues of the State for similar purposes. This also comes out of the pockets of the taxpayers. Add to this the losses that have been experienced and you get a tragic picture. The gradual destruction of fish life can be estimated at $10,000,000 in the last 37 years.

The trapping of fur-bearing animals in these bottomland areas which was once a considerable industry has been immeasurably reduced by the reclamation of these areas. Trapping yielded a handsome income to many people, but today there is little or no trapping along the Illinois River and hence it can be said that the reclaiming of these drainage areas has resulted in substantial income loss to many of our citizens.

Gullible people who bought drainage bonds, thinking they were an excellent investment, found that they held but pieces of paper. For proof I cite the fact that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has assisted in the refinancing of some 19 drainage districts along the Illinois River and on this refinancing losses to holders of the bonds will aggregate $2,000,000. In the case of the Chautauqua Drainage District in Mason County, the original investment of $264,000 is entirely gone, and this district is being taken over by the Biological Survey of the Department of Agriculture for a wildlife refuge. The contractor who built this levee is still holding an unpaid statement for $37,233.32.

As to losses occasioned by floods, you have your choice as to the amounts estimated. The Illinois Planning Commission, in its report to the Governor in December 1934, estimates the damages in the 1922 flood at $5,650,000 and $12,250,000 for the floods of 1926–27. Mr. William F. Mulvihill, former supervisor of waterways, estimates the aggregate damages for the period 1922–29 at $30,000,000. Other items of loss such as interest on invested capital in these drainage districts might be multiplied to show that during the last 37 years the losses and the costs involved in this problem of flood control have been enormous, and that these losses and costs in considerable part are taxed upon the taxpayers of the Nation. By way of corroboration, I submit that on March 29, 1937, there came to my desk a letter from the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers Flood Sufferers Commission to which was attached a bill that they want introduced. In that bill they ask that $500,000,000 be appropriated out of the Federal Treasury to indemnify the flood sufferers. All of which indicates that when floods do their damage, citizens look to the Federal Treasury for aid and the money in that Treasury is raised by taxation on all of the people of the land.

Perhaps all this might be condoned in the light of misunderstanding and lack of knowledge or lack of consistent State and national policies, but it will be nothing short of criminal if we continue with policies which are at cross purposes and which fall heavily and needlessly upon the taxpayers of the land, and that, after all, is the point to this presentation. Are we to continue a hodgepodge of State and national policies involving flood control, reforestation, recreation, and soil conservation which are at variance with each other, or shall there be some coordination in the development of such policies which takes into account the long-range needs of the people and displays proper regard for economy and efficiency?

In that connection let me quote from the report of Charles F. Thompson, director of the department of conservation for the State of Illinois, as set forth in the Illinois Blue Book for 1935–36:

> The protection of our streams, our forested areas, and our agricultural acres is a major part of a program of conservation, and must also be accomplished educationally. Restoration of replaceable resources must at least keep pace with, or preferably, it should surpass destruction or utilization.
> A discussion of the merits of engineering or other artificial and scientific means employed during recent years to change or improve upon Nature has no place here. Agencies in both Federal and State Governments, unfortunately, in many instances operate so independently that the aims of each are often wholly or in part defeated by the projects recommended and carried on by others. A demand for building, on one hand, is often ineffectual by reason of opposing theories calling for destruction and extermination.
> Swamplands, ideal as environment for waterfowl and fish life, and an important factor in the maintenance of the water level, have been drained. Streams have been dredged and straightened until they are only sewers or canals, instead of waters, steadied by winding courses and the small obstructions accumulated by Nature. Century-old trees and grasses, holding the soil and its richness, preventing erosion and the silting of streams, and, it is held by many authorities, controlling the rainfall in some measure, have been removed.

Let us first estimate what is ahead. The Illinois Planning Commission, in its very sound and basic report of 1934, estimates that by 1960 the population of Illinois will be about 9,000,000, 80 percent of whom will be living in cities, and 65 percent of whom will be living in cities with populations over 10,000. Now, it must be a patent fact that you might coop our people into large cities with their synthetic and artificial recreational facilities, but you cannot destroy their instinct for outdoors. The very fact that that instinct is cribbed and confined through lack of outdoor recreational facilities only subverts those instincts and makes for trouble. That same report calls attention to the alarming increase in juvenile delinquency with the comment that it is largely an urban problem. How can it be otherwise when the opportunity to get into the fields and forests and to the streams with a prospect for fishing and hunting and other outdoor pursuits has been almost entirely destroyed? That same report indicates that less than 10,000 acres of State parks are available for the entire population of the State and that a program for the expansion of such parks should be inaugurated. It calls attention to the further fact that fish and game propagation in the State of Illinois is wholly inadequate to the needs of the people, and recommends that 5,000,000 acres be devoted to forest areas, wildlife refuges, game preserves, and recreation sites.

A very natural question arises in connection with this recommendation. Was the State of Illinois and its people once blessed with all these things and if so what has happened to them? The answer is an emphatic yes. Once upon a time, all these things existed in Illinois. Only a hundred years ago, we had 14,000,000 acres of forest lands in our State. Today we have but two and one-third million acres. Our forests were destroyed before we were generally conscious of what trees and forests really meant from the standpoint of soil conservation, soil erosion, fixation of moisture, and for other purposes. Now we know, and today the Government in cooperation with the State is trying to undo the damage. The Illini Forest Unit and the Shawnee Forest Unit in southern Illinois have been marked out and the lands are being purchased. When completed, these two units will embrace approximately 575,000 acres but the cash with which to buy them back for the people will be taken out of the Federal Treasury. In other words, it will require the money of the taxpayers to undo the destructive work which was done during the last 100 years and this is but a beginning.

We had wildlife refuges and sanctuaries, we had lakes and streams that abounded in fish and required no appropriations from the State or Federal Treasury for their propagation but they are gone. Those lakes have been drained and converted into cornfields, enthroned behind huge levees. We begin now to appreciate what wildlife means to the people of this Nation. A special committee of Congress has spent several years in exploring the prospects for the restoration of what has been destroyed. The Bureau of Biological Survey is now provided with millions to carry on a program of land acquisition so that what little outdoor life we have might be preserved coupled with the hope that what we once had might be restored. And may I say at this point that the country is fortunate in having at the head of the Biological Survey a man like Dr. Ira Gabrielson, of Iowa, who has vision, who has courage, and who foresees the absolute need of a far-flung, long-range program of restoration and conservation. The problem of the Biological Survey is not to find upland where quail and pheasant and other birds can be propagated but to find lands along our watercourses where a program for the restoration of wild fowl and fish can be carried on and where the people of the State may have an opportunity to fish and hunt without the guilty feeling of being trespassers upon some private domain.

As I think of these 200,000 acres of leveed drainage lands along the Illinois River in their relation to Federal functions, I cannot but think of the fantastic variances which are involved. Under the A. A. A., cash benefits were paid out of the Federal Treasury to take some of this land out of cultivation because we had a surplus of corn at ruinous prices. At the same time, hope ran high that the Federal Treasury might be tapped for an additional $3,000,000 or more to set back and enlarge the levees so that a larger floodway might be provided and added safety assured to those who were farming behind these levees. Meanwhile, the Biological Survey is hoping fervently for a long-range program of land acquisition along watercourses on which to restore and conserve wild fowl and fish. At the same time, Congress is preparing to appropriate $25,000,000 for the Soil Conservation Service so that it might initiate erosion-control programs and lessen the liklihood of future floods. The United States Forestry Service is seeking millions and millions to carry on its program of reforestation, erosion control, and restoration of vegetation so as to intercept the rain water and fix it in the soil and thus minimize floods. Every known plan, program, and device has been adopted to meet problems of flood control, recreation, conservation, restoration, and crop control except the feasible plan of buying these lands, which nature provided as reservoirs, giving them back to the people for wild fowl, fish, and recreation and thereby relieving the Treasury of future demands for crop-control benefits, flood-control levees, maintenance, damages, and losses.

Now, mark you, good people of Illinois, this is a serious matter. The same Illinois Planning Commission, referred to above, estimates that the cost of a program which is designed to set back the levees along the Illinois River at the taxpayers' expense, in order to hasten the run-off of floodwaters and afford a wider floodway in our Illinois River, estimates the cost at $8,000,000. Every hunter, every fisher, every lover of outdoors will help pay this bill. Once this program of setting back the levees at public expense for the sake of hastening the journey of floodwaters to the sea and for the purpose of protecting 200,000 acres of drainage lands, occupied by something over 3,000 residents, is undertaken, it will be the kiss of death to any restoration of wildlife, restoration of fishing, and the restoration of hunting and recreation in the Illinois Valley. It will constitute the end to all hope.

It will mean that the interest of 3,000 residents of drainage lands along the Illinois River is made paramount to that of hundreds of thousands of our citizens who buy hunting and fishing licenses annually in the hope of finding a spot where that instinct of pursuit can be given free play.

When I say hundreds of thousands of families, I mean exactly that. In 1933, 280,525 resident hunting licenses and 354,927 fishing licenses were issued in our State. Since then it has been on the increase. Here are hundreds of thousands who pay for the privilege of hunting and fishing, but where shall they fish and hunt unless the State and Federal Government can provide a place for them? They cannot hunt on the farms of the State because farmers for the most part have posted their lands with "no trespass" signs. They cannot hunt on private duck preserves or on land protected by Federal court injunctions. They cannot hunt ducks on sandy uplands, nor can they fish in streams that have but a trickle of water. They must hunt ducks in the habitat of ducks, and they must fish where fish are available or can be made available, and that means particularly in the Illinois Valley.

If a program for setting back the levees along the Illinois River is once undertaken at public expense to the extent of millions of dollars, there will be no power in heaven or earth that can ever undo it. The time to stop it is before it starts. The time to protest is now. The time to put an end to this proposed permanent destruction of the wildlife resources and outdoor facilities, which in truth and in fact belong to the people of our State, is now. The time to make certain that these resources will be recaptured for the people by a long-range joint program between the State and Federal Government is now, and it calls for action.

May I remind you that $2,998,000 has already been authorized in the Flood Control Act of 1936 to start this levee set-back program and pay for damages to lands, but the money has not yet been appropriated? Think of it. Almost three million more of public money to insure safety to drainage lands and hasten the run-off of floodwaters. Once that money is appropriated it will put the seal of death upon the hopes of hundreds of thousands of hunters, fishers, and lovers of the outdoors. It will mean that any program for restoration and conservation in the future will require the undoing of this proposed work at enormous expense to the taxpayers. I therefore issue this solemn warning that the time is at hand for action if we expect to prevent this ghastly mistake. The time has come for the people and for the outdoor organizations in Illinois to become sustainedly vocal in this matter and let the Federal Government know what they want.

If I may be so presumptious as to say it, I believe I have an idea of what they want. I believe the people of the State, instead of seeing additional millions of public money expended to set back and enlarge the levees that now enclose 200,000 acres of land that were once the property of the people of the State and constituted a vacation land where they could hunt and fish and picnic, want to see these lands restored to the river, to the fish and wildfowl, and made public lands. I believe they would like to see the Federal Government take them over now and place them under the supervision of the Biological Survey so that fishing and hunting might be restored. I believe they would like to see these lands restored to the river so that they might be available as flood reservoirs in time of high water. I believe they want to see a program that will provide for the purchase of these lands at the fair cash market value so that equity might be done to the present owners. I believe the taxpayers are tired of seeing millions of public moneys spent at cross purposes and are quite disgusted with the fact that enough money has been spent and lost on these drainage lands in the last 30 years to purchase them outright more than twice over. I believe the people of Illinois want to see the problem of flood control and conservation solved by a single expenditure of money that will put title to these lands in the Federal Government for the use of the people. To that end I have introduced a resolution, which was passed by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House of Representatives, requesting the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors to furnish data showing the cost of purchasing these leveed lands outright, in the hope that this program can be developed and ultimately adopted. I have informally discussed this proposal with Secretary Wallace and with Dr. Ira N. Gabrielson, Chief of the Bureau of Biological Survey, and, while I cannot speak for them, I feel satisfied that they are sympathetic with such a program. It will take the earnest and sustained effort on the part of every citizen of Illinois who is interested in wildlife and in the outdoors if such a program is to materialize. The time has come for action.

There will be opposition, of course. First will come opposition from those who have the engineering point of view and who believe in bigger and better levees and faster drainage of floodwaters. The best answer to this is in the billion-dollar tragedy which befell the people in the Ohio Valley this winter. Another answer to them is in the words of Prof. P. A. Herbert, member of the planning commission for the State of Michigan and professor of forestry at Michigan State College, who said recently:

> We will continue to have more and better floods if engineers are permitted to dominate flood-control policies. The present floods are proof of the fallacy in the engineering approach.

Then there will be opposition from some drainage-land owners who may be under some misapprehension as to what is proposed to be done. The Illinois Association of Drainage and Levee Districts has already submitted a resolution to the War Department and to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House of Representatives.

In this resolution they set up the fact that both the State and Federal Government have already invested $2,000,000 each in the present levee system for flood-control purposes. Right there they confess the whole case. If more money is expended on set-backs and levee enlargement, how much more difficult it will be to ever convert these lands into flood reservoirs, hunting and fishing grounds, refuges and sanctuaries for waterfowl.

In this resolution the association states that when these levees are enlarged with a "million dollars more" of taxpayers' money, "flood disasters, as they have been known in the past, will never be such in the future." That should be $3,000,000 instead of $1,000,000. What about the Ohio Valley, where floods reached the highest known stage on record this year?

In that resolution they state that the very thought of allowing these leveed lands to revert to a state of nature is "preposterous" and "absurd." It seems to me that in times past, when President Theodore Roosevelt inaugurated a conservation and reforestation policy to save our forests from destruction, it was regarded as absurd. Today the Federal Government is spending millions and more millions to save what forests we have and to undo the work of the despoilers who said that Theodore Roosevelt's policies were absurd.

In that resolution they point out that the—

> Landowners of the Illinois River Valley are under no obligation to any other people to provide free hunting grounds, swimming pools for fish, ponds for the frogs, or a feeding site for the wild duck to be shot in Canada or fed to the hogs in the lower Mississippi.

The answer to that is simple enough. Nobody contends that the landowners are under obligation to furnish these. The program I have in mind calls for the purchase of these lands and their restoration to the people. It is a matter that is invested with a public interest, and the owners of these lands cannot be permitted to stand in the way of public policy any more than one landowner could be permitted to prevent the State or the Federal Government from condemning his land for public use. Ever since the beginning of this Government State and Federal laws have uniformly provided that no man's property shall be taken for public use without due process of law, and there is no hint here that any other policy is to be pursued. I have stated repeatedly that I believe in the acquisition of these lands at their fair value, and there is ample precedent to show that such has been the policy of both State and Federal Governments.

Opposition to this program of buying these lands outright and getting away from the continuing public expense which is incident to their maintenance, and thus solving several problems at one stroke, is to be expected. So many things which are in the interest of the common people of our State and Nation meet with opposition that it is not at all surprising. It means, of course, that the people of Illinois must get busy if they expect to preserve for themselves and for their children the outdoor delights of the Illinois Valley which once belonged to them. It means that the people of Illinois must become articulate in an emphatic way if they expect to help end this business of spending public money for programs that are at cross purposes.

As individuals and as members of organizations, they must make it definitely known to the Senators and Members of Congress from Illinois what they want. They must make it known to the President and to the War Department. They must make it known to the Secretary of Agriculture and to the Chief of the Biological Survey. It is their problem, and I hope they will respond in such might and in such volume as will definitely get under way a program which is designed to give the Illinois Valley back to nature and to the people for their rightful enjoyment.

Is it asking too much that the Federal and State governments undertake a long-range program under which these lands shall be purchased at a probable cost of less than $25,000,000? Is it asking too much for the preservation of the outdoors and the wildlife, the hunting and fishing, for this generation and for the millions yet unborn? Is it too much to ask for the hundreds of thousands of our citizens, when this Government can afford to spend $50,000,000 for the building of a single battleship? We ask for less than one-half of that amount.

To the Izaak Walton Leagues of Illinois, to the Rod and Reel Clubs, to the hunters and fishers, to the lovers of outdoors, to the discerning people who appreciate that in years to come we must have some place for our people to employ their leisure, to the social workers who appreciate the mounting tide of juvenile delinquency, to those who see in the outdoors an antidote for social unrest, be it said that this is your problem, and the time to act is now.

I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURDICK] such time as he may desire.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT WILL CONTROL THE COURTS

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Chairman, those who are close to the situation here in Washington have little doubt but what the Senate and House will pass the Supreme Court enlargement bill and that the President will appoint six new judges who are known to be in favor of the New Deal. The measure will pass the House by an overwhelming vote, as do all measures which the President sponsors. Some of the Senators are independent and cannot be driven, but others are too afraid of their seats next time to endanger them by opposing the President, and when the show-down comes we will find the majority of the Senate voting for the bill. Over in the House it will be fast and furious, and I doubt very much if 150 votes can be secured to defeat the bill.

The reason why the Members of Congress will follow the President are as follows:

First, the President was elected by such a landslide that he has every reason to believe the people are with him on anything he asks for. While he kept silent in the last campaign about the Supreme Court, he feels that he has up speed enough to coast through on any measure.

Secondly, the whole administration, with its countless numbers of bureaus and corollary organizations, are going the limit out in the country to create public opinion behind the President in case any such public opinion is needed. In North Dakota it is easy to see who is carrying on the campaign to line up the people. There is the P. W. A. organization, the W. P. A., the Resettlement, the Soil Conservation organization, the Farmers' National Grain Corporation and its business feeder like the Farmers Union cooperatives. The Government has financed the Farmers' National Grain Corporation by unlimited credit at less than 1-percent interest, and the Farmers Union cooperatives work through the Farmers' National, and thus the chain is completed back to the Government. When the President wants action, Wallace takes action, the Farmers' National Grain Corporation takes action, and all the Farmers Union feeders get busy. The leaders of these business activities are all drawing salaries, some directly through the Agricultural Department, some through the Farmers' National, and the others from the feeders to the Farmers' National.

These officials get busy and hold meetings in the country and build sentiment. There is a one-sided argument put up by men under pay to do the job, then the farmer is ready to express his opinion.

What is true of the Agricultural Department is no less true with respect to Resettlement and W. P. A., although the directness of the undertaking is not as noticeable as in the Agricultural Department.

With all the Government forces backing what the President wants, there isn't the slightest chance of defeating the President's program, and in this system of Government support, is the danger to the Republic. It conclusively demonstrates that one in the position once as President, could perpetuate himself in office indefinitely, or just as long as he had public opinion supporting him, and, of course, he would shape public opinion just as the Government bureaus, subbureaus, and feeders are doing today.

The bill will pass for a third reason; the economic condition of the country is worse today than it was 3 years ago, and it will be worse 3 years from now than it is now. This is true for the reason that the President's New Deal is not sound. This will be demonstrated in time to the complete astonishment of many who shout for it and do not know what it is. Here are a few high lights of the New Deal: Forced scarcity of food products in a land teeming with hungry people; paying an annual interest toll to the international financiers of almost a billion and a half dollars; putting the aged of the land on a miserable dole as a substitute for a decent and honorable compensation; failure on the part of the President to recognize that it is the duty of the Government to plan and offer useful work to every man and woman who wants to work and who must have work to live. There is no use delaying action in the unfounded hope that private industry, as now operated, will again employ the great army of unemployed. This army is increasing annually because of inventions, and today with 12,000,000 out of work, private industry, if going as perfect as it thought it was in 1929, could not possibly employ more than 2,000,000 of these unemployed. If that is true, what about the other 10,000,000 men and women?

There are only two ways to bring about the employment of these extra 10,000,000 people. First, cut the price of fabricated merchandise so the workers can buy more merchandise, thus demanding more workers to fabricate more merchandise. In other words, raise the labor wage and the farmers' income, or lower the price of fabricated merchandise, or do both, and a stagnated business will be revived. Second, offer necessary work, scientifically planned, to all those who want to work, and pay them with labor-hour currency which has no tax free, interest-bearing attachments.

Divide this planned work into two divisions; first, emergency work to take up the slack until private enterprise can be released from the fetters of a strangling monetary system. Second, plan work in the nature of wealth-producing enterprises. Pay those working on the first classification with new emergency-work currency; pay those working in the second division currency denominated wealth-producing series.

Retire the first class of currency through taxation of the higher brackets of income and redistribute the wealth; retire the second class of currency from the income from the wealth-producing improvement. In no case will the currency cost the people one cent. The first class of currency redeemed through taxation will not be as big a drain on the people as the present plan of emergency relief through taxation, for the simple reason that this entire plan will in a few months of its operation remove those on the unemployed list to the list of the employed; then taxation for this purpose will stop.

There is nothing difficult about this, and, in my judgment, we will either accept this method of operation or private industry will disappear entirely. If that is what the people want, we are headed in this direction with full steam ahead.

Fourth, the President, when he assumed office, made a great contribution to the Government. He revived hope that had been lost by his speeches against the Hoover administration. Hoover had lighted the spark of revolution when he drove the bonus army out of Washington, resulting in the death of one of the army and the destruction of what little property they had assembled on the banks of the Anacostia. Roosevelt restored sane thinking, and the Nation went ahead with renewed confidence that at least one President had appeared who sympathized with the people. No one should want to detract from the President any glory of this important achievement.

The people, therefore, looked upon the President as the savior of the Republic, and hence anything he did had, and still has, their approval. The President started out on his New Deal, and it was unfortunate that it was not sound. It has not worked—it never will work. The Supreme Court found some of it, the worst of it, unconstitutional. The President then said the Supreme Court stopped him and that the New Deal would have worked had it not been for the opposition of the Supreme Court. The people, of course, believed the President; and when he tells them now to give him control of the Court or his New Deal will result in not only failure but conditions—as the President himself says—worse than 1933, the people still believe him.

I hold no brief for the Supreme Court—I am sure they have rendered many unfortunate decisions; but I am also sure that the New Deal will not bring back prosperity and happiness in this country, no matter if we could abolish the Supreme Court entirely.

If I were looking upon this matter purely in a political way and wanted to bring embarrassment to the Democratic Party, which I do not, I would suggest that this bill be passed and let the President have his own way—fill the Court with New Dealers, and sustain any law the President wants, because there is no power on earth to make a deal work that is wrong in its inception. The President then would have no alibi.

On principle alone, I oppose the measure, first, because I know the New Deal is wrong in principle, and, secondly, I deem it dangerous to our liberties to permit any one man to absolutely control every department of government.

Every Communist in America is solidly behind the President's program to take over the Supreme Court. I would like a picture of one who was opposed to the President on this issue. They support him not because they think that will cure our troubles, but because they believe it will make our troubles greater. Anything that will tend to injure the Government they are for, no matter what it is. They freely admit here and elsewhere that we cannot "patch up the profit system." They desire a labor dictatorship. If this were accomplished, they would discard Roosevelt as quickly as they discarded Kerensky. They see in this Supreme Court move a chance to "bore from within", as they call it, and finally procure a collapse of the Government.

In this country no dictatorship of any kind is necessary. We can preserve our institutions of society, the State, the home, the school, the church, and our business activities if we abolish our present monetary policy and adopt a standard for the issuance of money that will be fair to every endeavor in the Nation, namely, the labor-hour value of money, as provided in H. R. 3297.

This bill will put buying power in the hands of everyone who wants to work, the shackles of devastating interest burdens will be broken, and the unconscionable profits arising to private business by reason of the free use of Government credit will end. The grave menace of this interest system can be realized when we state that of every dollar spent by a purchaser over the counter of business today 51 cents of it goes for interest and taxes. This situation must end if we are to perpetuate this Government.

Has the President any notion of changing the money system? Has he any notion of depriving the international money changers of the right to buy Government bonds with the Government's own money? Who is his chief monetary counsel? The people, however, do not stop to think of this, but say, "Support the President in his fight to control the Supreme Court." Here is another curious fact: The President could stop every foreclosure in America tomorrow in which the Government has any interest by proclamation or by giving his approval to my own resolution before the House to stop foreclosures for 2 years. He takes no action. The foreclosures are going ahead unmolested in North Dakota and elsewhere. Yet these same farmers say—even those who are fighting against foreclosure—"Support the President in his fight against the Supreme Court."

This is strange psychology; and there is nothing to do about it except wait until the farmers get enough of what they are getting.

As long as the President makes no move to dislodge the international bankers from the control of the Government's credit for their own private profit there can be no recovery in this Nation.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON] 10 minutes.

PROTESTS CLOSING C. C. C. CAMPS

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I am grateful to the chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations for the kindness and courtesy in allowing me a few minutes at this time. It will not be surprising to some to announce that I propose again to discuss the situation with reference to the Nation's C. C. C. camps. It is true that I have discussed this matter on several previous occasions. Only a few days ago I addressed the House on this important subject, but inasmuch as it is, in my judgment, a matter very near and dear to the hearts of the members of the committee as well as the people of the Nation, I feel justified in again discussing some problems in connection with the C. C. C. camps of the country. May I say that I feel today somewhat like the minister who went to his new pastorate? On the first Sunday he preached on the subject of repentance. His congregation semed to like his first sermon very well. On the next Sunday he again preached on repentance. After he had preached repentance three or four times, some of the brethren went to him and asked why he could not find another subject to discuss. The new pastor replied, "Well, when the people of this place decide to repent, then I shall discuss another subject."

For the past year and more I have been talking about C. C. C. camps and the move on foot to gradually disband them. The fact is, as I stated here once before, in the fall of 1935, when Members interested heard 1,000 C. C. C. camps were scheduled to be closed January 1, 1936, a committee from the House called at the White House and interceded for the life of the C. C. C. camps. Instead of closing the entire 1,000 camps at that time, the Executive order was modified to abandon only about 300 camps. Since then repeated efforts have been made to get rid of the C. C. C. camps. Finally, as many of you will recall, it was necessary to call a meeting of all the Members of this House who were especially interested and, although we were told over and over again that our wishes could not be complied with, the fact remains that the camps were not closed.

Mr. Chairman, my purpose in rising at this time is to announce that 84 C. C. C. camps will be closed today, each camp having an average of about 165 men. If the men in these 84 camps, as well as those in others scheduled to close soon, are not absorbed by other camps or by business generally, they are destined to be thrown back on relief. July 1, it is proposed to close 630 C. C. C. camps in the United States unless this Congress takes firm action. One hundred and twelve of the 630 to be closed will be soil-conservation camps. These camps are especially desirous to be retained. They are making a great contribution in the Nation-wide problem of combatting soil erosion.

Mr. Chairman, may I emphasize the fact once more that these camps have not finished the task or work program which they set out to perform. As stated on the floor of this House last week, Mr. Robert Fechner, director of the E. C. W. program in the United States, appeared before the steering committee and gave valuable information concerning the work of the C. C. C. activities in the United States. Mr. Fechner did not pretend to say that all of the 84 camps closing today have actually finished their program. But they are being closed just the same. And mind you, 630 camps are going to be closed on or before July 1 unless the Congress takes some definite action to the contrary.

Not very long ago a subcommittee of the House steering committee called again at the White House. It is needless to say that we found the President deeply interested in the welfare of C. C. C. camps and appreciates the good work it is and has been doing. This is known as his pet hobby. However, the proposition or suggestion has been put straight up to Members of Congress to find the money to maintain the camps. May I once more call the attention of the Members of the House to the fact this money must be found to keep the camps open or we will lose 630 of them before July 1?

Mr. KENNEDY of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KENNEDY of New York. Will the gentleman tell us what the cost of continuing these camps will be, and I refer to the proposed 630 camps about which the gentleman just spoke?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. The cost will be in the neighborhood of $50,000,000. On July 1 there will be a reduction of 50,000 C. C. C. boys and, roughly speaking, it costs about $1,000 to keep each boy in these camps.

Mr. KENNEDY of New York. Has there been any estimate made as to the value of the work which has been done by these C. C. C. camps?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. That depends upon what is meant by "estimate." I am quite certain that the value of the actual work done by the 350,000 enrollees in the 2,086 camps in the United States during the past year far exceeds the money incurred in maintaining all the camps for the same period.

Mr. KENNEDY of New York. The intrinsic value of the work.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Yes. Many Members of Congress have estimated the work done by C. C. C. camps of the country are the most valuable and far-reaching undertaking of the entire national administration. When future generations look back upon this administration—the actual work done—the C. C. C. activities will undoubtedly stand out as the one shining star among the many worthwhile activities of this administration.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I am pleased to yield to my good friend from Oregon.

Mr. PIERCE. As I understand, the total appropriations last year were $403,000,000. Is that correct?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I do not just recall at this moment the exact figures, but I believe that is about correct.

Mr. PIERCE. The demand of the administration is that this amount be reduced to $300,000,000, or a saving of $100,000,000 on the C. C. C. camps. Is that correct?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I believe it is correct. I cannot give the figures in money, but I can do so as far as the personnel of the C. C. C. camps is concerned. At this time there are 350,000 enrollees in the 2,086 C. C. C. camps. After today there will be approximately 2,000 C. C. C. camps, and by July 1 there will be only 300,000 enrollees in 1,456 such camps in the United States.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I am delighted to yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. GARRETT. Is it not true also that unless some provision is made whereby these camps can be continued the men in the camps will be put on relief, and probably their families also?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. There is no question about that. Please bear in mind that these 350,000 boys or their families were on relief until the boys enrolled and began sending $25 per month home, at which time the families were, of course, taken off relief. It is absurd to contend that business will absorb the 50,000 enrolleees to be virtually kicked out of the C. C. C. camps July 1. All of us know that will not be done. These 50,000 boys, or at least the great majority of them, will go back on relief unless they are permitted to be kept in the camps.

Mr. GARRETT. In other words, about $25 of the $30 being paid each enrollee goes to his family, which has been on relief?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. That is correct; $25 per month of the enrollee's salary goes to his own family.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Certainly; I shall be delighted to yield.

Mr. PIERCE. Is it not really a question of who is to spend the relief money, Harry Hopkins or the C. C. C.?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Well, I prefer not to get into that phase of the discussion; but will say I favor giving Harry Hopkins every dollar he actually needs to take care of hungry people. I feel, however, that the C. C. C. camps should be cared for by a regular appropriation of this Congress and should not be treated as a relief measure hereafter. Certainly the camps have justified their existence and should be kept as a very important part of our regular governmental activities. Legislation to make the camps permanent is now in the making. So let us not get the program mixed up with the relief program. On the other hand, I am unwilling to spend fifty to sixty million dollars for one battleship, when the same amount would keep open all the C. C. C. camps which are going to be closed July 1, and pay the entire cost incurred in keeping 50,000 needy but worthy young men of America.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. HOUSTON. May I again commend the gentleman for his interest in this matter. Every great movement has to have a sponsor. May I say the gentleman from Oklahoma has shown more interest in this matter than any other Member of Congress during the last year and a half. We are all grateful for it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I am deeply grateful to the gentleman from Kansas for his very kind and generous statement. May I say I have visited many C. C. C. camps in more than a dozen States, and am deeply interested in the good work being done by them. But even more so am I interested and concerned in what is being done for the young men who are now in and have gone through the camps. The gentleman from New York asks about the value of the work accomplished by the camps. Let me say that the good work done for the 2,000,000 young men who have been in the camps cannot be measured in dollars and cents.

Mr. HOUSTON. Has the gentleman any idea where we can get the money to continue these camps?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. The gentleman has asked a very pertinent question, how can the balance of the 630 camps be retained? I tried to make it clear in my remarks on the House floor a few days ago that the camps cannot be retained unless this Congress can find the money within the Budget. None of us want to be compelled to raise additional taxes for any purpose. But this Congress can find ways and means to keep these camps open without raising additional taxes or going outside of the estimates of the Bureau of the Budget if it really wants to do so. I realize full well that it is extremely difficult to cut the estimates of the various departments of Government, but I am certain that it can be done. Let me say again that I am going to do my best, in my humble way, to do that very thing.

I have remarked many times that Congress might economize by eliminating one or two battleships that will be out of date and useless within a few years, and take the money saved and keep every C. C. C. camp in the United States open. Surely we could at least postpone the construction of just one $60,000,000 battleship for a couple of years.

Mr. HOUSTON. Is it not possible for the Chief Executive to transfer funds from one department to another in order to continue this activity?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. That could be done; certainly.

Mr. HOUSTON. What would be in order, then, to attempt to have this done?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. If the gentleman from Kansas will recall, that very thing was done 1 year ago, when Members became greatly aroused over the prospects of having 700 C. C. C. camps abandoned. Let me again suggest that if Members of Congress would get together as was done a year ago and demand that no more camps be closed and let the "powers that be" know we really mean business, it could be done and we could still stay within the Budget.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Certainly.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I was interested in the gentleman's remarks about a battleship. As I understand, the naval appropriation bill is now in conference, and has not finally passed. Is it not possible we may appeal to the conferees for sufficient savings, out of the conference on the bill to provide the funds needed?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I am pleased the gentleman has asked that question. That, of course, would help some, but I know of no way under the present situation to cut off even one of those $60,000,000 battleships. I wish it could be done.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. After our conference at the White House some members of the Naval Appropriation Committee, handling the bill, said, "We will do our best to try to cut the naval appropriation below the Budget estimate." When the bill came onto the floor, the committee, so I understand, had whittled the naval appropriation some $38,000,000 below Budget requests, but the appropriation, in my judgment, was still unreasonably and inexcusably high.

When the naval bill went to the body at the other end of the Capitol more than the $38,000,000 which had been saved was added, so we hear. This is what happens on nearly all of the appropriation bills. The bill is now in conference, and there will be no chance of saving anything like $38,000,000, to say nothing of one or two of those big useless battleships that will take several years to construct; that is, if the conferences between the two Houses run true to form and go as they usually do.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Does not the gentleman think it might be possible that if we could keep the naval appropriation bill within the House recommendations the money saved might be used for C. C. C. purposes?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Well, I will say to the gentleman that I should like to see that thing occur. But let me say in closing that if the C. C. C. camps are to be saved Members interested should meet, as we did last year, organize and make our purpose and plans known and felt. I plan on calling such a conference soon, and I here and now invite all Members interested to join me in such a call. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Chairman, as there are no further requests for time, I ask that the Clerk read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For mileage of Representatives, the Delegate from Hawaii, and the Resident Commissioner from Puerto Rico, and for expenses of the Delegate from Alaska, $171,000.

Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee: On page 11, line 19, strike out "$171,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$85,000."

Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, some 50 years ago, or about that time, the custom obtained of allowing Members of the House 20 cents per mile as mileage. As I recall, the first appropriation was made in about 1880. Since that time, I call the attention of my colleagues here on the floor to the fact that conditions are very different from those that obtained at the time the appropriation was first made.

I have offered this amendment in the best of faith. I think, as Members of the House, we can well afford to give this matter due consideration, and I hope the members of the committee will thoughtfully consider this recommendation that the mileage of Members, both in the House and at the opposite side of the Capitol, be properly fixed at not exceeding 10 cents per mile.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. COLLINS. The gentleman knows that the mileage allowed Members of the Senate and the House is less than the cost of transporting Army officers and their families from post to post, does he not?

Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee. I am not prepared to state the expense incident to transporting Army officers.

Mr. COLLINS. I was wondering why the gentleman does not go after worth-while items instead of trivialities.

Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee. Well, this is not such a large matter, I concede, but it is one that affects each one of us and the taxpayers, and if we are anxious to have economy I do not see why we should not set the example.

What I have in mind is that the actual expense of the Members incident to going and coming would be proper. When the 20 cents per mile was allowed, it was in the "horse and buggy" days and in the days of the toll gates and hacks and considerable time was required to get to Washington. At this time we have the modern highway, the automobile, and most of us own our own conveyance, and we recognize it does not require anything like 20 cents per mile in going and coming to the Nation's Capital.

I have offered this amendment with the idea that this amount of $85,500 will amply cover the actual expense because of the changed conditions that now obtain on account of the automobile, the highway, and closer train connections. Formerly a much greater time was consumed by the Members in going and coming to the Capital.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee. I will be very pleased to yield.

Mr. HOUSTON. As I understand, the gentleman's amendment proposes to reduce the mileage?

Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee. From 20 cents per mile to 10 cents per mile; yes.

Mr. HOUSTON. Has the gentleman ever returned any of his mileage to the Government?

Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee. I will say, frankly, I have not; but I may say that I think now is a good time for each and every Member to begin to practice economy.

Mr. HOUSTON. There is no law against returning some of the mileage.

Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee. And in this way we would set an example of economy to the other departments of the Government.

Mr. HOUSTON. There is no law against returning part of the mileage.

Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee. That is true.

Mr. HOUSTON. But the gentleman has not returned any of it.

Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee. No; I have not. Pass this amendment and let all Members share——

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the amendment.

I presume the gentleman from Tennessee is perfectly honest and sincere in his proposal. The gentleman wishes to cut down the amount set forth on page 11 of the bill under the heading of "House of Representatives, salaries and mileage to Members", the particular paragraph reading as follows:

For mileage of Representatives, the Delegate from Hawaii, and the Resident Commissioner from Puerto Rico and for expenses of the Delegate from Alaska—

The gentleman wants to cut the amount from $171,000 to $85,500, or one-half.

The amount of a Member's mileage is the amount fixed by law, 20 cents per mile. If the gentleman from Tennessee is sincere, I wish he would propose a legislative amendment to the act that established the mileage at 20 cents per mile. This is the place where the amendment should apply.

What will be the effect if the gentleman's amendment here is adopted and reduces this amount from $171,000 to $85,500? It will mean only that some of the Members will receive the full amount of their mileage, according to present law, while some of the Members will not receive it, because there will be an exhaustion of funds and they will not receive the appropriate mileage due them under the law, and then, of course, some agency of the legislative establishment will have to appear before the deficiency committee of our Appropriations Committee to secure the balance of the sum required.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Yes.

Mr. O'MALLEY. The gentleman's amendment does not provide for the manner in which those shall be distinguished who shall receive the full amount or only part of it.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. That is the point I make, that the first half of the membership to get to the window first will consume the $85,000, and then the other half will go away empty-handed.

Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee. But the gentleman is cognizant of the fact that it would not require anything like the $85,500.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. That is beside the point—whether it actually costs a Delegate from one of these possessions 20 cents per mile. The gentleman's argument about the increased facilities of travel is beside the point in this bill. If the gentleman wishes to change the original measure that provided for mileage, I wish the gentleman from Tennessee would offer an amendment to that measure.

Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee. I have so introduced a bill, and it is pending before the committee, and I have asked for a hearing.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. That demonstrates the gentleman's sincerity on this point, and I hope he will succeed; but I must object to the amendment being inserted in this appropriation bill at this time, and I hope the Committee will turn it down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee) there were—ayes 2, noes 67.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Public Buildings and Grounds—clerk, $3,300; assistant clerk, $1,740; janitor, $1,260. Public Lands—clerk, $2,760; assistant clerk, $1,740; janitor, $1,260. Revision of the Laws—clerk, $3,300; janitor, $1,260. Rivers and Harbors—clerk, $3,300; assistant clerk, $2,460; janitor, $1,560. Roads—clerk, $2,760; assistant clerk, $1,740; janitor, $1,260. Rules—clerk, $3,300; assistant clerk, $2,100; janitor, $1,260. Territories—clerk, $2,760; janitor, $1,260. War Claims—clerk, $3,300; assistant clerk, $1,740; janitor, $1,260. Ways and Means—clerk, $4,620; assistant clerk and stenographer, $2,640; assistant clerk, $2,580; clerk for minority, $3,180; janitors—one, $1,560; one, $1,260. World War Veterans' Legislation—clerk, $3,300; assistant clerk, $2,460; in all, $299,480.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HANCOCK of New York: Page 14, line 22, after the word "janitor", strike out "$1,500" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,560."

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Mr. Chairman, I understand that this amendment is acceptable to the committee. If that is true, I have no comments to make about it.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Chairman, I have discussed this matter with the gentleman from New York. The amendment represents an increase of $60 a year to be paid to the janitor of the Committee on the Judiciary. He seems, for some unknown reason through the years, to be the only janitor for a major committee who is receiving $60 less than the other janitors.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. He is the only janitor to a major committee receiving $1,500.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. The committee has no objection to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the total at the end of the paragraph be increased the necessary $60.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DOCKWEILER: Page 15, line 21, strike out "$299,480" and insert in lieu thereof "$299,540."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

CLERK HIRE, MEMBERS AND DELEGATES

For clerk hire necessarily employed by each Member and Delegate, and the Resident Commissioner from Puerto Rico, in the discharge of his official and representative duties, in accordance with the act entitled "An act to fix the compensation of officers and employees of the legislative branch of the Government", approved June 20, 1929, $2,190,000.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. COLLINS: Page 19, after line 19, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"For additional services in the office of each Member and Delegate and the Resident Commissioner from Puerto Rico, in the discharge of his official and representative duties, at a rate not to exceed $1,800 per annum, as to each such office, $783,000."

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from North Carolina rise?

Mr. WARREN. I rise to make the point of order that it is not authorized by law.

Mr. FRED M. VINSON. The point of order comes too late, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the point of order?

Mr. WARREN. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. COLLINS. And I make the further point of order that I had secured recognition from the Chair before the point of order was made, and therefore the point of order comes too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman had not begun his remarks. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Mississippi on the point of order.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the point of order comes too late. I was on my feet and had been recognized by the Chair, as will be shown by the stenographic notes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not believe that the point of order comes too late. The gentleman from North Carolina was on his feet seeking recognition at the time the gentleman rose.

Mr. COLLINS. On the contrary, I had secured recognition from the Chair and was approaching the Well of the House for the purpose of speaking to my amendment before the gentleman addressed the Chair, all of which will be shown by the stenographic notes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi had not begun debate on the amendment, and even though the Chair had recognized the gentleman from Mississippi, the gentleman from North Carolina was on his feet at practically the same time, and the Chair does not believe that the point of order has been raised too late.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I assert that the Chair had gone so far as to address me and recognize me. I had gone so far as to say "Mr. Chairman."

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. LUCAS). The attention of the Chair has been called to a ruling that was made on April 18, 1904, upon this same subject matter. It specifically states—

To preclude a point of order, debate should be on the merits of the proposition.

This opinion was made by Chairman Crumpacker, and at that time he had this to say in section 6901 of volume V of Hinds' Precedents:

The Chair is of the impression that the discussion was not upon the merits of the bill, but informally with a view of determining some preliminary matters, and under those circumstances it would seem that Members would have the right to make the point of order.

In other words, this even goes further, as the Chair sees it, than the matter that is before us at this time.

Mr. COLLINS. With all due deference to the Chair, I think the Chair misunderstands the meaning of the language he has just read. The Chair had gone so far, in the instant case, as to say, "the gentleman is recognized for 5 minutes", as will be verified by a number of Members whom I hear speaking at the present time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair calls attention to another decision which the Parliamentarian has given him, which is section 6906, as follows:

Although a point of order may not be made after debate has begun, yet the Chair does not permit a few sentences of debate to preclude a point of order made by a Member who has shown due diligence.

Mr. COLLINS. But he has not shown it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair disagrees with the gentleman from Mississippi because, as the Chair stated, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] was on his feet at the same time that the Chair recognized the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS].

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, let us be perfectly frank about this thing. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] was waiting for somebody else to make the point of order. Nobody else made the point of order and I was recognized by the Chair and had reached the Well of the House for the purpose of speaking on my amendment before the gentleman from North Carolina made the point of order. These are the facts that everyone in this Chamber knows.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS. I yield.

Mr. O'MALLEY. I want to recite to the gentleman that I distinctly heard the Chair say that the gentleman was recognized for 5 minutes, and that in a similar instance in the Seventy-fourth Congress I made a point of order that a point of order had come too late, and I was proceeding from my place to the Well of the House, and the Chair held that the point had come too late, even though I had not yet begun my remarks.

Mr. COLLINS. I have been in this House for 16 years, and I have seen this same question arise not once but hundreds of times.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule on the point of order made by the gentleman from North Carolina. In the opinion of the Chair, there is no authorization under the law for the additional clerks as is proposed by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS]. Obviously, it is an attempt to pass legislation upon an appropriation bill. The Chair sustains the point of order made by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN].

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I appeal from the ruling of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Committee?

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SNELL) there were ayes 72 and noes 23.

So the decision of the Chair stood as the judgment of the Committee.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BOILEAU. As I understand it, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] offered an amendment, to which the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] made a point of order. Then I understand the gentleman from Mississippi made the point of order that the point of order made by the gentleman from North Carolina came too late. Did the Chair overrule the point of order made by the gentleman from Mississippi? I should like to have that matter clarified as to what the vote was taken on.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overruled the point of order made by the gentleman from Mississippi and sustained the point of order made by the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. BOILEAU. That is as I understood it, but as to the vote the gentleman from Mississippi asked for an appeal and the vote was taken on the appeal. On which of the points of order was the appeal taken?

The CHAIRMAN. Obviously the appeal was taken upon the point of order made by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN]. That is the way the Chair stated it.

Mr. BOILEAU. That is the way the Chair stated it, but I was not sure that the Members of the House understood it.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. O'MALLEY. I will confess I did not hear the point of order stated by the gentleman from North Carolina, and I am in doubt as to whether the stenographic notes will show what his point of order was.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina made the point of order that it was legislation.

Mr. O'MALLEY. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from North Carolina just what he did say.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Chairman, I very distinctly stated, and certainly those sitting around me heard me, that I made the point of order on the ground that it was not authorized by law, and the stenographer's notes will so show.

The CHAIRMAN. That is as the Chair understood it.

The regular order was demanded.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, on the question of clerk hire for ourselves, I think we should provide our own offices with capable assistants and a sufficient number of them to perform properly our work, and this we are not doing now. Government officials in various departments come to us and ask for clerk hire and assistants sufficient to perform the duties of their offices, and we very willingly and liberally grant these requests. And it is done as a matter of course, but when it comes time for us to provide ourselves with adequate clerical assistance so that we can perform the every-day functions of our offices then we slink away in a cowardly fashion and refuse to provide it, because we fear that the people back home do not approve. This is a species of cowardice about which we should feel ashamed. I think it is time that somebody should venture to tell the truth about this and speak out in the open as to our needs.

At present I am spending over $3,000 per year out of my own limited income in order to staff adequately my office and answer the letters that come to me and do the other official work that I must do.

This is a bill making appropriations to the legislative establishment and therefore the proper bill to provide money for additional help. I will go anywhere to present our needs, but certainly there should be some place open to us to present our case and secure that which should be given as a matter of simple justice.

I do not agree with the Chair in the ruling of the Chair today. I do not think any point of order was made before I reached the Well of the House after beginning a speech upon my amendment. Furthermore, I do not see the necessity of being so extraordinarily technical about this amendment, because all of us know that each and every other appropriation bill, including this one, is filled to overflowing with legislative enactments that have been carried, some of them for nearly 100 years, all of which are subject to points of order, and no points of order are made except in this instance.

Mr. Chairman, the time is here when we must provide ourselves with additional clerks. The Social Security Act alone will put upon our desks at least 25,000 cases that we must handle for the people of our districts who will write us about their claims; and if we do not provide ourselves with this help now I do not know what is going to become of us or the people whom we represent, whose claims will be dropped in our laps to handle for them.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS. I yield.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I agree with everything the gentleman has said about the necessity for additional clerk hire. It seems as though we legislate and appropriate for everything on earth downtown that they ask or desire, but when it comes to ourselves, we run off and hide.

Mr. COLLINS. Absolutely.

Mr. HOUSTON. The time has come when we should meet this need and take care of it.

Mr. COLLINS. We can get additional Capitol policemen anytime. Right now we could get 25 additional Capitol policemen, although the Capitol is now full of them, but we cannot get funds to provide competent assistants to help us with research and other important every-day business, because we fear that some opponent will criticize us in the next campaign. And we should realize that the people back home are intelligent and know our needs about as well as we do.

Mr. HOUSTON. If the gentleman will permit a further interruption, Mr. Chairman, I call attention to the fact that in the bill before us we are creating 15 additional positions in the Library of Congress, but we cannot provide for an additional clerk in our own offices where we need them. I agree with the gentleman. I hope some way is worked out whereby additional help can be furnished.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS. I yield.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Chairman, I may say to the gentleman from Mississippi that I have considerable sympathy with what the gentleman has in mind. I made the point of order because it was very proper that I should protect the committee of which I am chairman, and also in view of the vote that was taken in the House a little over a year ago on this same question. Personally, I will welcome the cooperation of the gentleman from Mississippi and other Members, if they can aid us in working out some attack on this problem that we realize is especially acute in the case of at least certain Members of the House.

Mr. COLLINS. I am very happy to hear the statement that the gentleman from North Carolina has made, for it is the first ray of sunshine on this perplexing problem that I have seen. I shall therefore introduce this afternoon or tomorrow morning a bill to give to each Member of the House an additional clerk.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 additional minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLLINS. My bill will be introduced within the next 24 hours. I promise this. I should like to know when the gentleman will take up this bill for consideration by his committee.

Mr. WARREN. The committee, of course, has other matters to be considered. It is a matter which will be considered in the usual way. I wish the gentleman to understand that I am not committing myself to any bill that he might introduce.

Mr. COLLINS. I understand that.

Mr. WARREN. I am telling him that I will see that he gets a prompt and early hearing, and I will welcome his cooperation in trying to work out something.

Mr. COLLINS. I am very thankful to the gentleman, and I do hope the assistance that we look for and the sympathy my friend expresses will be adequate.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

By unanimous consent, the pro-forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Legislative garage: For maintenance, repairs, alterations, personal and other services, and all necessary incidental expenses, $9,280.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOUSTON: Page 26, line 11, after the sign and figures "$9,280", insert the following: "Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended to maintain, repair, or operate this garage to provide parking space for any privately owned, motor-propelled, passenger-carrying vehicles not the personal property of a Senator, Representative, Delegate from a Territory, or the Resident Commissioner from Puerto Rico."

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I am offering this amendment because it has been called to my attention by various Members of the House that it is impossible to get space in this legislative garage. It was stated to me a moment ago an application has been pending for 3 years to get a Member the right to put his car in this garage. I understand 96 Senators and 80 Members of the House have the right to use the garage. Possibly some of the Architect's cars are situated there. There are also a good many cars of the secretaries to the Senators garaged there. In fact, I have been told recently that the place is cluttered with cars belonging to Senators' secretaries. I think it is no more than right the Members of the House should have the privilege of using this garage for which we appropriate the money. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOUSTON].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Office Buildings: For maintenance, including equipment, miscellaneous items, and for all necessary services, $350,290.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. DOCKWEILER: Page 27, line 3, strike out "$350,290" and insert in lieu thereof "$351,370."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The purchase of supplies and equipment and the procurement of services at the Botanic Garden may be made in the open market without compliance with sections 3709 and 3744 of the Revised Statutes of the United States in the manner common among businessmen, when the aggregate amount of the purchase or the services does not exceed $50 in any instance.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of this item which relates to the Botanic Garden in order to ask the chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations a question which I confess I have been asking off and on for 16 years.

Why should the House of Representatives run a greenhouse and what is the function performed there?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. I think I know what the gentleman has in mind and I have about the same attitude of mind the gentleman has. It will be noted the committee has appropriated less this year for the operation of the Botanic Garden than ever before.

The only justification for the Botanic Gardens, so far as I can see, is that it raises and supplies plants and shrubs to supplement dying plants, trees, or shrubbery around the grounds here on Capitol Hill. In 1931 the Botanic Garden cost for maintenance about $195,000. This has been gradually reduced to the $101,000 we recommend here. I believe that for $101,000 we could supply all the plants necessary to take care of the landscaping around the Capitol and the Congressional Library. This should be transferred to the Department of Agriculture if the activity is worth anything.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I remember asking the same question of the chairman a year or two years ago, and making the suggestion that perhaps this activity could be transferred to the Department of Agriculture and taken away from the Congress. It does not belong under our jurisdiction at all. To me it is a standing joke, and will be as long as it is carried in this bill.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. The gentleman from New York might be interested to know that for the last few years we have not continued to fill the vacancies which have occurred in this particular activity. There are only a few employees left, and as an employee retires or demises we do not fill the place. We have an agreement with the Architect of the Capitol that he shall not fill these places when they become vacant. In this bill we have dropped the salary of the Director of the Botanic Garden, which represents $4,600 a year. It is an activity that the Architect has been undertaking. The position has not been filled during the last few years. We have practically done away with that position, and it will not be refilled.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Garden distribute plants or flowers gratis to anybody?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. It does not distribute gratis one single plant. Some of these hothouses are filled with plants for display purposes only.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I cannot see that it is of any use at all then.

The pro-forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the Register of Copyrights, Assistant Register, and other personal services, $251,900.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, may I make reference to a small item appearing on page 20 of the bill, reading as follows:

For payment of one-half of the salaries and other expenses of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation as authorized by law, $29,000.

The Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation in the two branches of Congress expends the sum of $58,000.

May I call the Committee's attention to the saving that this committee brings about in connection with rehearings of refund cases? The law provides that refunds in excess of $75,000 shall be referred to this joint committee. I think we should recognize the fact that the committee has as its experts some of the leading tax men of the country. The head of the committee is Mr. L. H. Parker, who is recognized throughout the country as a great tax expert.

He is absolutely independent and impartial in his judgment. Men who are employed under him are of the greatest assistance to the Committee on Ways and Means and to the Senate Committee on Finance, as well as to our joint committee. I am saying this simply in justification of this small item of appropriation.

Our records show that during the several years this committee has been in existence we have, conservatively estimated, saved directly for the Federal Treasury at least $2,000,000. Indirect savings have been many times greater. An item in one case now pending before the Bureau raised by the staff involves something like $700,000 in tax and interest and is illustrative of the importance of the technical work of the joint committee.

I think as a member of the minority I owe these few words to the majority in respect of the employees we have on this Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation. I for one am pleased to bring to the attention of the House the interest these men take in their work and the results that come from it. An appropriation such as this is money very well expended.

Mr. ANDRESEN of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield.

Mr. ANDRESEN of Minnesota. Has this special committee ever reduced the amounts of refunds recommended by the Internal Revenue Bureau?

Mr. TREADWAY. That is exactly what they do. They reach a compromise in some of the larger cases, especially in the very large cases, and very frequently they reduce the recommendations made by the Department, by this action checking up on the Department.

The pro-forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

LEGISLATIVE REFERENCE SERVICE

To enable the Librarian of Congress to employ competent persons to gather, classify, and make available, in translations, indexes, digests, compilations, and bulletins, and otherwise, data for or bearing upon legislation, and to render such data serviceable to Congress and committees and Members thereof, and for printing and binding the digests of public general bills, and including not to exceed $5,700 for employees engaged on piece work and work by the day or hour at rates to be fixed by the Librarian, $100,490.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COX: Page 31, line 8, after the word "to", insert the word "hereafter", and after the word "persons", in line 9, insert a comma and the following: "including a Director at $8,000."

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment, as I believe it changes the existing law.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, it is barely possible the amendment is subject to a point of order. However, I trust that after my brief statement the gentleman reserving the point will not insist upon making it.

The purpose of the amendment is simply to reclassify the position of Director of the Legislative Reference Service in the Library of Congress. The duties described by the Code as falling within this grade are as follows:

> Grade 6 in this service * * * shall include all classes of positions the duties of which are to act as assistant head of a major professional or scientific organization, or to act as administrative head of a major subdivision of such an organization, or to act as head of a small professional or scientific organization, or to serve as consulting specialist, or independently to plan, organize, and conduct investigations in original research or development work in a professional, scientific, or technical field * * *. The annual rates of compensation for positions in this grade shall be $5,600, $5,800, $6,000, $6,200, and $6,400, unless a higher grade is specifically authorized by law.

Mr. Chairman, the duties of the Director are more properly described under grade 8 of the professional service:

> Grade 8 in this service, which may be referred to as the chief professional grade, shall include all classes of positions the duties of which are to act as the administrative head of one of the largest and most important professional or scientific bureaus, or to perform professional or scientific work of equal importance, difficulty, and responsibility. The annual rates of compensation for positions in this grade shall be $8,000, $8,500, and $9,000, unless a higher rate is specifically authorized by law.

In 1923, Dr. Putnam, the Librarian, in his annual report, said:

> The office of Director has never been filled, for the lump-sum appropriation has not sufficed to afford a salary necessary to secure a competent man. It requires knowledge of law, economics, political science, linguistic equipment, and the sort of judgment, discretion, and experience which readily fetch from $7,500 to $12,000 (e. g., for the directors of research in the Chamber of Commerce of the United States).

The Legislative Reference Service is a Government service consisting of a staff of 51 members. It was created by the Congress 20 years ago (see 38 Stat. 1005) for the purpose of furnishing the Congress with information and data for or bearing upon legislation. Hence it is concerned with the highest type of research in all matters of economic, political, and social science, history, and law. It includes among its staff lawyers, economists, statisticians, and historians. It is constantly engaged in furnishing Congress with highly technical information concerning Federal and State laws, finance, taxation, economics, political science, constitutional history and law, American and European history. It serves Congress to the extent of replying to approximately 5,000 inquiries annually, these responses involving the widest range of human endeavor and activity. The demands upon the Service are as comprehensive as are the needs of Congress.

The Service assembles a vast mass of information from a large number of scientific and technical journals, from analytical indexes of Federal and State statutes, and from reference lists of published material. It gathers data from committee reports, from debates in Congress, from the messages of the Presidents, and from communications from executive officers; from financial and economic publications of many foreign countries; from the reports of executive bureaus and departments; from publications and statements issued by bar associations, economic associations, educational societies, and all national organizations discussing pending or proposed legislative measures. This collected material constitutes the primary source of Legislative Reference Service information. It is made available to Members in the form of specially prepared manuscripts and photostatic reproductions. The manuscripts prepared in the Service represent the results of highly technical research. Upon the Director of the Service falls the burden of transmitting information in innumerable instances directed by phone from his own fund of information and from his knowledge of sources and the availability of material.

Inquiries are received from Members on many questions of constitutional law and on the history of the Constitution and its clauses, and responses to these inquiries involve the preparation of extracts and digests from authorities on various aspects of the Constitution and notes on the interpretation of various constitutional questions by the Federal courts. Inquiries of this character are important and require careful research.

During the months of February and March 1937 the Service responded to more than 300 inquiries relating in some way to the President's message on the Federal judiciary, these inquiries involving an extensive knowledge of the constitutional and legal history of the United States, of Federal court procedure, and fundamental concepts of American Government.

The section of the Service devoted to the indexing of State laws covers the entire field of State legislation. The Service publishes biennially an index of the laws of all 48 States, together with a digest of important changes in the substantive law, by means of which a Member is able to gather prompt and accurate information as to what the State law is on a given subject and to ascertain the trends of legislation in all the States. A special section of the work indicates changes in administrative law.

The work of the Foreign Law Section is to answer with promptness and accuracy inquiries from Members concerning the laws of foreign countries and to make comparison of such laws with those of the United States. There is involved not only research in the original language of these laws but also translation into proper English legal terminology. It is work which requires a knowledge not only of important foreign language but requires on the part of the Director the ability to determine whether the translations carry proper import and significance. There is constant demand from Members for data on foreign law in many fields.

The Service maintains for Congress a bill-digest section, devoted to the digesting and indexing of all bills of public general interest currently introduced. These digests, together with a cumulative subject-matter index, are published periodically during the session. Special attention is given to indicating the modification of existing law proposed for enactment. The bill-digest section keeps a record of legislative action on all bills, and this record is substantially complete from the Sixty-eighth Congress to date.

The economics and history section of the Service is called upon many times daily not only during the congressional session but when Congress stands in recess as well. It furnishes Members of Congress with a vast amount of information on all phases of history and economics, and especially with current information.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. That the present Director of the Service possesses the qualifications described by the Librarian is evident from the fact that since the present Director took office, to wit, November 1, 1935, the Service has responded satisfactorily to almost 5,000 inquiries from the Congress, an increase over any similar period of almost 2,000 inquiries. At present these inquiries from Congress average about 600 monthly.

But that the description of the duties of P–6, under the Classification Act—the grade in which the present Director is classified—does not accurately describe the duties performed by the Director of the Legislative Reference Service is readily apparent.

Moreover, it is of importance to note that the Librarian has provided for the "consultants" of the Library compensation far in excess of that paid to the Director of the Legislative Reference Service. The "consultants" of the Library, or "holders of chairs", as the Librarian describes them, never respond to the demands of the Congress—few of them have more than a secretary. According to the report of the Librarian (hearings on the legislative establishment appropriation bill, 1931, p. 206), these consultants—

> Serve only in a special relation, necessarily informal, possibly temporary, certainly tentative, and * * * would be embarrassed if they were subject to all the incidents of the regular service * * *.

And yet the compensation paid these consultants exceeds by far that paid the Director of the Legislative Reference Service, who is subject to all the incidents of the regular service, and who, during a busy session of the Congress, is compelled to devote approximately 10 hours daily to the duties of his office, and to supervise the activities of one of the largest divisions of the Library of Congress.

Further, it is important to note that the salaries paid to the chiefs of bureaus in all other departments of the Government are far in excess of that paid the Director of the Legislative Reference Service. And yet none of these officers performs more responsible duties nor is called upon to respond to more urgent demands than those to which the Director of the Legislative Reference Service is constantly compelled to respond; for, while the functions and duties of each of these officers are confined within narrow limits, the duties of the Director of the Legislative Reference Service are as wide as the legislation presented during a complete session of Congress. The legislative counsel are paid at the rate of $10,000 per annum.

That the present Director possesses the qualifications described by the Librarian as requisite for the position may be judged from the fact that he holds the doctorate of jurisprudence and a baccalaureate degree in political science. His academic training includes courses in the physical and applied sciences, in agriculture, and in medicine. For 25 years he held the chair of political science and history at a prominent State university. In 1927–28 he was in charge of the research conducted by the House Committee on Flood Control, and in 1928 he conducted the research in both House and Senate incidental to the passage of the Boulder Dam legislation. In 1930 he was assigned to the Senate during the consideration of the legislation culminating in the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act. He is the author of a number of studies in history and political science, and he has written numerous articles on medicine.

The effect of the amendment which I have offered is simply to increase the Director's salary about $2,000.

I am sure, Mr. Chairman, the Members of Congress are acquainted with the work of the Director of the Legislative Service, that gentleman in charge of this legislation may see their way clear to let the amendment be submitted to the committee, and that the committee will adopt it.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COX. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. Who is this great man the gentleman is talking about? I did not get his full name.

Mr. COX. I do not mean to say that he is necessarily a very great man, but he is a very extraordinary one.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman read his record, and it seemed to me he is too big a man to be buried in the Library of Congress.

Mr. COX. He is Dr. George J. Schulz, and is a valuable public servant.

Mr. SNELL. I just wanted to find out who this great man is.

Mr. COX. I do not mean to unduly applaud him as the greatest of men, but he is a very able one, as I happen to know from my acquaintance with him and from having availed myself of the services which he has been rendering.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Chairman, I have reserved the point of order against the amendment that it changes existing law, irrespective of the fact that this gentleman, Dr. Schulz, may be a splendid official. If we attempt to give him a salary of $8,000 by this bill, it would certainly place his salary completely out of line with the salary of the other heads of divisions, such as the Law Librarian, the Chief of the Copyright Office, and the like. The position he occupies of Director of Legislative Reference, like all other positions in the Library, comes under the provisions of the Classification Act. The law requires the Classification Division of the Civil Service Commission to assign these positions to pay grades of the Classification Act. This position has been allocated to a grade where the salary ranges are from $5,600 as a minimum to $6,400 as a maximum. That is the law. Therefore, I feel that under the circumstances I must make a point of order——

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Yes.

Mr. COX. If the gentleman insists upon his point of order, and if the gentleman and the other members of the committee are not willing to accept the amendment, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment, and at the same time I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. I have no objection to the gentleman withdrawing the amendment.

The amendment was withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia to extend his own remarks in the RECORD?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

INCREASE OF THE LIBRARY

For purchase of books, miscellaneous periodicals and newspapers, and all other material for the increase of the Library, including payment in advance for subscription books and society publications, and for freight, commissions, and traveling expenses, including expenses of attendance at meetings when incurred on the written authority and direction of the Librarian in the interest of collections, and all other expenses incidental to the acquisition of books, miscellaneous periodicals and newspapers, and all other material for the increase of the Library, by purchase, gift, bequest, or exchange, to continue available during the fiscal year 1939, $100,000.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I notice the heading of this paragraph is "Increase of the Library." Since I have been in Congress I have seen the volumes of books in the Library increase quite considerably. I think when I first came here the personnel numbered 350 or 400, and I am now informed the number is about 1,200 or 1,500. I am not objecting to this. I think our country should have the greatest library in the world, and there is no question now but that we do have it, but I would like to know how this army of employees is appointed.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. They are appointed by the Librarian of Congress, Dr. Putnam.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Are there any civil-service requirements in connection with such appointments in the Library?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. None whatever. Their grade and rate of pay are fixed under the Classification Act of 1923, as amended.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. How are they classified?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. The Civil Service Commission classifies the work they do and assigns the position to the grade under the act and the pay for each grade is specified by the act.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. But all the appointments must be made by the Librarian?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Yes.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Is there any other place in the Government where such a condition exists? Is there any other case where any one man has the right to appoint twelve or fifteen hundred employees?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. I am not familiar with that situation, I may tell the gentleman from Ohio. Of course, the Librarian does not undertake to do all this work himself. He has a personnel officer and has division chiefs.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Has he a personnel officer, as a matter of fact?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Yes; and the personnel office has had a great deal more work to do because of the large number of applications they have to consider whenever a vacancy occurs. As I understand the practice, the personnel officer does his best in recommending to the Librarian the proper sort of person to fill a vacancy.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I have been a Member of Congress for a good many years, and I know men who have been here much longer than I, and I understand from them that the head of the Library never seems to think there is anybody from their respective sections of the United States qualified to serve in the Library. The same is true as to my district. How does this come about?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. I may say to the gentleman from Ohio that I had heard similar stories until I became personally acquainted with Dr. Putnam, and I must say that my mind has been completely disabused of any such idea. It is true that he has this large number of employees, but there is not a large turn-over in the course of a year, and his personnel officer tries to recommend the most appropriate person.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Can the gentleman tell me how many employees there are in the Library now?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. I have a list of them here somewhere.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. While the gentleman is locating that list let me ask the gentleman this further question, because I am in earnest about the matter. I do not yield to anybody in the Congress in my loyalty for the Library. I used to work in a library myself and I certainly have the best interests of the Library at heart, but from what I hear from various Members, they are more or less critical of the Library because it seems there is some sort of a coterie that handles all of this patronage. If civil service is worth anything, and in my opinion it is, I do not see why any one man should have the authority to appoint 1,200 or 1,500 people without some congressional control somewhere along the line. I think this is too large a number for any one man to handle, and I know I am reflecting the sentiments of others who are, perhaps, more interested in this than I and who have been here much longer than I have, and these men have indicated that they have heard rumblings from home and other places because many sections do not have any representation in the Congressional Library.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. The gentleman has asked how many employees there are in the Library. In the Library proper, including its activities as such, there are, as I understand, 426 positions. In addition to these there is the force in the Copyright Office of 133 positions, the Legislative Reference Service, the Card Index Division, and one or two other small activities. These bring the total up to 675 positions. The custodial force, including guards and charwomen, totals 161. So in all there are 836 positions.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I understand from what I believe to be reliable authority that there are 1,200 employees, all employed by one man. Has the gentleman's committee any authority or would it be unusual for it to make some recommendation to the Congress that that ought to be changed so that we might know? I find that everybody is afraid to ask this great man how he manipulates all these things. Maybe I have made a serious mistake in bringing this matter up, but he cannot hurt me, because I do not think anybody from my district ever got a foot inside the Library; but I should like to know whether the committee has canvassed that situation with the idea of making a recommendation that this might be changed.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. I can inform the gentleman to this extent: We have not made any recommendation this year as to any change that should be made, legislatively or otherwise, so far as the procurement of personnel is concerned in that Library. But since the Congressional Library is operated and completely supervised and controlled by Dr. Putnam, the gentleman can rest assured that the committee has in the past, and as I know from my own personal experience this year, questioned the doctor very carefully as to his activities. We compel him repeatedly to give us a list of every one of his employees, the position, and rate of pay, and whether or not there is a step-up in the amount of salary, and whether there are reallocations of the positions by the Civil Service Commission. Whenever he asks for a reallocation and step-up in salary we are careful in investigating and getting the information. It is set forth also in the Budget each year.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I believe that the Library should not be a football of politics. But I insist that it should not be operated as a thing apart which everybody should look upon as something above or beyond the representatives of the people. There are many millions of Government money invested in that Library. This is the people's money and the Librarian, however powerful he has become, is not more powerful than the people. This man should not be encouraged in his tendency to arrogate infallibility to himself and I should like to know whether this committee has had a chance to satisfy itself as to whether there is a special coterie that selects the personnel of the Library force from among certain favorite groups from certain favored universities or fraternities. If the committee has not looked into this, I think it should do so. Is this great institution to be manned in a way that the people and their rights are fully respected? That is what I want to know.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. I would say from what we glean from our own hearings of Dr. Putnam and the heads of his divisions, I have not found, as a personal matter, that any clique or coterie in the Library is doing the selecting and filling the vacancies, and if the gentleman wishes to change the situation as to how appointments are made, the law would have to be changed. We are not a legislative committee. The law must be changed, because under the law the Librarian has the right to make these appointments. I have not found any impropriety in the selections or that any coterie or clique over there are controlling these selections, and I am being very frank with the gentleman when I say that, because I have heard the same rumors. Rumors have reached me similar to those that the gentleman has spoken of.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. How much has this increased in the last year?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Does the gentleman mean in personnel?

Mr. DOWELL. Personnel and in amount.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. The increase amounts to 18 extra persons. The Librarian asked for 41 and we gave him 18, and the increase for personnel amounts to a total of $27,540. We have added other items which increase the annual expenditure for the Library for next year to the extent of $45,400, including the new personnel.

Mr. DOWELL. Is that in the Library, or does that include all of the branches covered in the Library?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. All branches, the Copyright Office, every activity in the Library. The 18 new employees are scattered through those activities.

Mr. DOWELL. Does the gentleman's committee increase the number of employees and permit him to fix the pay as he may? Is that the policy of the committee?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Our committee determines every new position, but there is no new position created unless the money is supplied for it. However, the amount of pay for the position is fixed by the Classification Act under finding by the civil service.

Mr. DOWELL. Does the committee make an investigation of the needs of the Library, or is the committee just simply taking his recommendations?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. That is a very appropriate question and I am very glad the gentleman has asked it. In the 3 years that I have been a member of this Subcommittee on Appropriations the doctor has made a similar request for anywhere from 28 to 41 further employees. The last 3 years we have refused those requests until now, and we felt it is necessary to grant this request. We do not give him all that he asked for. No doubt he needs all he asked for, but we give him 18, and the gentleman will note that those 18 employees are placed in those divisions in the Library where essential work is necessary respecting every book or document.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time be extended for 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Of those 18 we gave 9 new employees to the Catalog Division. Every book that comes in there has to be treated. There is no use having millions of volumes and pamphlets unless they can be treated and cataloged and classified and placed where they can be reached. So we have given the bulk of these 18 new places to the Catalog and Classification Division.

Mr. DOWELL. As I understand the gentleman, during the 3 years he has been a member of the committee there has been no increase in the number of employees in the Library until this time. Is that correct?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. That is correct.

Mr. DOWELL. There has been no increase whatever except this time?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Yes. Over the previous 5 years the average annual increase amounted to four per year. There were 20 new employees in 5 years previously, an average of 4 each year.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purchase of books and for periodicals for the law library, including payment for legal society publications and for freight, commissions, and all other expenses incidental to the acquisition of lawbooks, $60,000, to continue available during the fiscal year 1939.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HARLAN: Page 34, line 4, after the word "books", strike out "$60,000" and insert "$70,000."

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, we are located at the Capital of a great Nation, the seat of our Supreme Court, the location of our legislative body, the location of many embassies in which questions of international law, international treaties, and all sorts of questions pertaining to litigation and law making arise. We have a law library containing 300,000 volumes. Many of those are duplications. That is 200,000 less than Harvard University has and much less than the University of Michigan, although I do not have the exact figures. It is also less than the library of the bar of New York City. In fact, there are a number of places in the United States much better equipped with lawbooks than we are at the Capital. In Los Angeles County, with which the chairman of the subcommittee is very familiar, there is appropriated somewhere in the neighborhood of $100,000 a year for this purpose.

We have a library that is functioning with less personnel than any similar library in the country. We have 17 people in the law library. At Harvard University they have 30, and at other different libraries they have comparable numbers.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARLAN. I yield.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Of the new employees carried for the library in this bill, one of them is assigned to the law librarian.

Mr. HARLAN. That is true, but we are talking about the purchase of books. This library is supposed to perform the most important function in the country and it has not only a very limited personnel, but a disproportionate number of books. The personnel is very limited. It is embarrassing if someone comes here and goes to the Congressional Library to get a book and not be able to get it and have to send to Harvard University or New York City or the University of Michigan and bring it here to the United States law library where you and I have to work.

That library must remain open every hour that Congress is in session. If we have a night session the law library must remain open, under the law. It is a part of our work, as well as theirs. It is the working tools of this body, and I think we should not be niggardly with that group. Last year we appropriated $115,000 for the entire library. We took $15,000 off of the general appropriation this year and added $10,000 to the law library. I believe those figures are correct. In view of the fact that books are increasing in price, I think we ought to restore this $5,000 to the law library and add $5,000 for additional cost. You save no money by being penurious with the law library, because the opportunity to purchase books is when they are for sale. If we have no fund out of which to buy the books that are needed at the time they are for sale, they go into other libraries and the opportunity is lost to us forever. What we are doing now is keeping up our reports, our periodicals, and our encyclopedias. They cannot do much more than that. We are not accumulating a working library such as comparable situations would demand. I urge upon you the necessity of adding at least $10,000 to this appropriation for the working tools of this body. If we are expected to function, we certainly ought to supply ourselves with the tools with which to do it.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do not want to rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio. I think the reason this committee did not want to go any stronger than $60,000 for the law library of Congress was due largely to the fact that this subcommittee was more or less trying to make a record for good housekeeping. We have reduced the bill some $946,000 under the estimates for next year. I suppose mainly because this is our particular appropriation bill that affects each and every Member of the House and Senate, and it is our own domestic business, we felt that we should break the record in trying to save money without doing any great injury to the legitimate processes of Government. So when we came to this provision, whether or not we should award $60,000 or more for the law library, we said it should remain at $60,000. There is no doubt in my mind that everything the gentleman from Ohio has just said is true. Never before in the hearings, to my knowledge, has there been more testimony rendered in behalf of an increase in the law library than was done in the hearings this year.

Some very distinguished gentlemen representing bar associations—the Bar Association of the District of Columbia, the American Bar Association, and others—appeared before the committee; and it is in the face of their testimony that we gave an increase over last year's budgetary item of only $10,000. Last year the law library received $50,000. This year we are giving it, under the terms of this bill, $60,000. Very distinguished people, however, appeared before us to make a plea for a greater sum of money; so I cannot with any great vigor oppose the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Ohio. As chairman of the committee I would say that the committee does not have any opposition, but I should like to ask the ranking minority member of the committee, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. POWERS], if he has any objection?

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I do not feel that I can oppose the amendment, for I feel very much as does the gentleman from California, the chairman of the committee. I am willing to accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purchase of books and periodicals for the Supreme Court, to be a part of the Library of Congress, and purchased by the Marshall of the Supreme Court, under the direction of the Chief Justice, $7,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair directs the attention of the gentleman from California to a misspelled word, "Marshall", on page 34.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment correcting the spelling.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DOCKWEILER: Page 34, line 8, strike out one "l" in the word "Marshall."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

In order to keep the expenditures for printing and binding for the fiscal year 1938 within or under the appropriations for such fiscal year, the heads of the various executive departments and independent establishments are authorized to discontinue the printing of annual or special reports under their respective jurisdictions: Provided, That where the printing of such reports is discontinued the original copy thereof shall be kept on file in the offices of the heads of the respective departments or independent establishments for public inspection.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of making an inquiry of the chairman of the committee. At the top of page 42 is a provision authorizing the heads of executive departments to discontinue the printing of annual or special reports under their respective jurisdictions. How much money will be saved by this provision?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Replying to the question of the gentleman from Iowa, I may say that the cost of printing those reports does not come within the jurisdiction of the legislative subcommittee. Such printing cost is chargeable to the department itself and is handled by the subcommittee handling appropriations for the department in question. Have I answered the gentleman's question?

Mr. DOWELL. In other words, the gentleman's committee has no jurisdiction over the printing of the reports from the departments.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. That is right.

Mr. DOWELL. Then, why is this provision in the bill authorizing the discontinuance of the printing of certain reports, especially if this matter is handled by other committees, and the gentleman's committee has no jurisdiction over it? Why is this provision carried in the bill?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. I am informed by the clerk of this committee, who has been with it for many years, that a similar provision has been carried in this bill from year to year. There is no explanation for it other than it has been carried from year to year.

Mr. DOWELL. Then we may understand that the provision is meaningless?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. It has served a useful purpose in the past and is likely to again under certain circumstances, but it has just been carried from year to year.

Mr. DOWELL. As I understand it, however, it is not enforced in any way and no one pays any attention to it.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. That is right. It is discretionary authority that sustains existing practices.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LUCAS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5966) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and for other purposes, directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? [After a pause.] If not, the Chair will put them en gros.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was, on motion of Mr. DOCKWEILER, laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a letter on the Supreme Court controversy written by me to a Connecticut newspaper.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the mileage of Members of Congress.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. BIGELOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Tuesday next, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of matters on the Speaker's table, I may be permited to address the House for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on April 9, after the disposition of business on the Speaker's desk, I may be permitted to address the House for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on April 6, after the disposition of business on the Speaker's table and the previous orders heretofore entered, the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. CASE] may be permitted to address the House for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. GARRETT asked and was given permission to revise and extend his own remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a brief statement made by Dr. John A. Vieg, of the University of Chicago, on the judiciary proposal of the President.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an address made last evening by the Honorable Harllee Branch, Second Assistant Postmaster General.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. May I ask whether the rule has been changed with reference to the insertion of extraneous matter in the RECORD? I notice the last three or four gentlemen who have asked permission to extend their remarks have indicated they want to include the statements of people who are not connected with the Congress in any way. A day or two ago I received a request from a prominent gentleman, formerly a Member of this House, who wished to have inserted in the RECORD a certain compilation that he and another distinguished lawyer had made. I wrote to him and told him I did not think I could have the matter included in the RECORD. Now I am awakening to something I did not know about, apparently.

The SPEAKER. In answer to the parliamentary inquiry of the gentleman, the Chair may say that the rule is if a Member desires to extend his remarks by incorporating therein any extraneous matter, such as editorials, excerpts from newspapers or otherwise, he must obtain the permission of the House to do so. If objection is made to the incorporation of such matter by another Member of the House, the request is denied.

Does that answer the gentleman's inquiry?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Yes. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to insert therein a statement compiled by Henry T. Bannon, formerly a very distinguished Member of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. PETERSON of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a speech delivered by Mr. Herbert S. Phillips, United States district attorney in my district.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

SENATE

THURSDAY, APRIL 1, 1937

(Legislative day of Monday, Mar. 29, 1937)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. ROBINSON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of the calendar day Wednesday, March 31, 1937, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Megill, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 5966) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, as the coal bill is before the Senate, and it is necessary to have a quorum, I ask that the roll be called.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Connally	King	Pittman
Andrews	Davis	Lee	Pope
Ashurst	Dieterich	Lewis	Radcliffe
Austin	Duffy	Lodge	Robinson
Bachman	Ellender	Logan	Russell
Bankhead	Frazier	Lonergan	Schwartz
Barkley	George	Lundeen	Schwellenbach
Bilbo	Gerry	McAdoo	Sheppard
Black	Gibson	McCarran	Steiwer
Bone	Glass	McGill	Thomas, Okla.
Borah	Green	McKellar	Thomas, Utah
Brown, Mich.	Guffey	McNary	Townsend
Brown, N. H.	Hale	Maloney	Truman
Bulkley	Harrison	Minton	Tydings
Bulow	Hatch	Moore	Vandenberg
Burke	Hayden	Murray	Van Nuys
Byrd	Herring	Neely	Wagner
Byrnes	Hitchcock	Norris	Walsh
Capper	Holt	Nye	Wheeler
Caraway	Hughes	O'Mahoney	White
Chavez	Johnson, Calif.	Overton
Clark	Johnson, Colo.	Pepper

Mr. LEWIS. I announce the absence of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. DONAHEY], occasioned by illness.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS], and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] are necessarily detained on important public business.

Mr. AUSTIN. I announce that the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] is absent because of illness and that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] is absent on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

VISIT OF GOVERNOR GENERAL OF CANADA TO THE SENATE

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair asks the indulgence of the Senate for a moment while he makes a statement.

The Chair is advised by the State Department that His Excellency the Governor General of Canada will probably visit the Senate end of the Capitol about 3:15 p. m. today and, if agreeable to the Senate, will probably desire to come to the Senate Chamber. It is the opinion of the Chair, in view of that situation, that it might be advisable to appoint a committee to arrange the matter. So, without objection, the Chair would like to appoint the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] as the committee. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the committee is appointed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Joint resolution relating to Federal aid for the planting, preservation, and restoration of wood lots on farms

Whereas the recurring droughts and floods in the United States, with their increasing toll of destruction, desolation, and economic loss, constitute a problem requiring the immediate attention of the National Government and the exercise of all of its powers to prevent, if possible, the recurrence of these great disasters; and

Whereas the President has recommended to Congress the enactment of legislation for a comprehensive national flood-control program of 10 years' duration and costing well in excess of $1,000,000,000, which includes provisions for flood-control reservoirs on the tributaries of all major streams subject to floods, and dikes and floodways to protect river cities and centers of population; and

Whereas this great program would be more effective if it also included plans for meeting the basic problem of conserving our soil and waters in our great agricultural areas, especially on lands at the headwaters of the feeder streams of our river systems; and

Whereas this purpose could be secured at a minimum of public expense if farmers and other landowners would devote to forestry, under proper forest management, the millions of acres of overgrazed wood lots and denuded slopes which are to be found intermingled with good agricultural lands in many parts of the country; and

Whereas the denuding of these lands, which in the public interest should be forested, is proceeding at an alarming rate and experience has demonstrated that farmers and other landowners cannot or will not practice proper forest management unless they are afforded a financial inducement to do so; and

Whereas the State of Wisconsin has gone as far as it can to promote sound conservation practices, through according tax exemptions for limited areas of farm wood lots devoted to sound forestry practices; and

Whereas the President has often recognized the need for the reforestation of the denuded slopes at the headwaters of our streams, and provisions to this effect are included in the legislation for the development of the Tennessee River Valley: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate (the assembly concurring), That the Legislature of Wisconsin memorializes the Congress of the United States to enact legislation to encourage the reforestation of farm wood lots and slope lands, the discontinuance of grazing thereon, and the planting of shelterbelts, by providing Federal aid to the States to remunerate farmers and other landowners for using these lands and adopting practices which will result in reforestation and the conservation of the soils and waters of our major agricultural regions; be it further

Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be transmitted to the President, the Secretary of Agriculture, both Houses of the Congress of the United States, and to each Wisconsin Member thereof.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a resolution of the General Court of Massachusetts, memorializing Congress in favor of the establishment of a 5-day week and a 6-hour working day, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

(See resolution printed in full when presented today by Mr. WALSH (for himself and Mr. LODGE.))

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the Council of the City of St. Paul, Minn., and the San Francisco (Calif.) Housing Association, favoring the prompt enactment of pending legislation providing low-cost housing, which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Youngstown (Ohio) Slovak Political Club, favoring the enactment of legislation to enlarge the membership of the Supreme Court, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate a statement in the nature of a memorial of the Minnehaha County Bar Association, Sioux Falls, S. Dak., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to enlarge the membership of the Supreme Court, or any other legislation that might tend to impair the independence of that Court, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented resolutions adopted by a meeting of citizens of East Texas assembled at Tyler, Tex., favoring the adoption of the President's court and judiciary proposals, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LODGE (for himself and Mr. WALSH) presented a resolution of the General Court of Massachusetts, favoring the prompt enactment of legislation restoring certain women to citizenship, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

(See resolution printed in full when laid before the Senate by the Vice President on Mar. 31, 1937, p. 2936, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

Mr. WALSH (for himself and Mr. LODGE) presented the following resolution of the General Court of Massachusetts, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor:

Resolutions memorializing Congress in favor of the establishment of a 5-day week and a 6-hour working day

Whereas the present conditions existing throughout the country with respect to unemployment are causing serious want and great distress; and

Whereas such conditions are in fact due to the lack of sufficient work to furnish employment to all who desire it; and

Whereas the shortening of the working day and week would make it possible to employ more people in gainful occupations: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Court of Massachusetts hereby records itself in favor of the establishment of a 6-hour working day and a 5-day week; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of the Commonwealth send engrossed copies of these resolutions to each Member in Congress from this Commonwealth and to the presiding officers of both branches of Congress.

Mr. CAPPER presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Kansas, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

Concurrent resolution relating to the continuation of the Civilian Conservation camp located near Scammon, Cherokee County, Kans.

Whereas under the emergency conservation work of the United States Government, familiarly known as the Civilian Conservation Corps, a C. C. C. camp was located near Scammon in Cherokee County, Kans.; and

Whereas the purpose of this conservation work is to relieve acute conditions of distress and unemployment and to provide for the restoration of the natural resources of the country and the advancement of an orderly program of public works; and

Whereas the nature of the work in said C. C. C. camp is that of leveling off old coal dumps and strip pits and the planting of trees; and

Whereas in the strip pit coal mining a large portion of the land in that part of the State had been shoveled up and laid waste, causing much devastation and loss of tax revenues from such lands; and

Whereas the continuation of said C. C. C. camp would be a worthy contribution toward reforestation and restoration of natural resources, and it is desirable that such a program be continued: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Kansas (the house of representatives concurring therein), That we urge and request the continuation of the Civilian Conservation camp near Scammon, Cherokee County, Kans., for the purpose of leveling off coal dumps and strip pits and the planting of trees; be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state be directed to transmit a copy of this resolution to Hon. Robert Fechner, Director, Emergency Conservation Work, Washington, D. C.; and one copy each to Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER and Hon. GEORGE MCGILL, United States Senators from Kansas; and one copy each to Hon. W. P. LAMBERTSON, Hon. U. S. GUYER, Hon. EDWARD W. PATTERSON, Hon. ED H. REES, Hon. JOHN M. HOUSTON, Hon. FRANK CARLSON, and Hon. CLIFFORD R. HOPE, Representatives in Congress from Kansas.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. THOMAS of Utah, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 890) for the relief of Walter S. Hendershot, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 280) thereon.

Mr. WALSH, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 772) for the relief of F. P. Delahanty, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 281) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 1316) to provide for the reimbursement of certian enlisted men and former enlisted men of the Navy for the value of personal effects lost by fire at the naval training station, Hampton Roads, Va., on February 21, 1927, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 282) thereon.

INVESTIGATION AND COORDINATION OF EXECUTIVE AGENCIES—LIMIT OF EXPENDITURES

Mr. BYRD, from the Special Committee to Investigate Executive Agencies of the Government, reported an original resolution (S. Res. 110), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, as follows:

Resolved, That the special committee authorized by Resolution No. 217, Seventy-fourth Congress, agreed to February 24, 1936, to investigate the executive departments and agencies of the Government, hereby is authorized to expend from the contingent fund of the Senate $25,000 in addition to the amount heretofore authorized for the same purpose.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTIONS PRESENTED

Mrs. CARAWAY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on March 30, 1937, that committee presented to the President of the United States the following enrolled joint resolutions:

S. J. Res. 66. Joint resolution providing for the participation by the United States in the Greater Texas and Pan American Exposition to be held in the State of Texas during the year 1937; and

S. J. Res. 75. Joint resolution making funds available for the control of incipient or emergency outbreaks of insect pests or plant diseases, including grasshoppers, Mormon crickets, and chinch bugs.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF THE COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS

As in executive session,

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported favorably the following nominations, which were ordered to be placed on the Executive Calendar:

W. J. Jamieson, of Arizona, to be State administrator for Arizona in the Works Progress Administration;

John K. Jennings, of Indiana, to be State administrator for Indiana in the Works Progress Administration, vice Wayne Coy, resigned; and James H. Crutcher, of Louisiana, to be State administrator for Louisiana in the Works Progress Administration.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED

The bill (H. R. 5966) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PRINTING OF REPORT—THE TAXING POWER OF THE FEDERAL AND STATE GOVERNMENTS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate House Concurrent Resolution 7, which was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That in accordance with paragraph 3 of section 2 of the Printing Act, approved March 1, 1907, the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation be, and is hereby, empowered to have printed for its use 5,000 additional copies of its report entitled "The Taxing Power of the Federal and State Governments."

Mr. HAYDEN. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 7) was considered and agreed to.

MORATORIUM ON FARM MORTGAGES—OPINION OF SUPREME COURT (S. DOC. NO. 47)

Mr. FRAZIER. I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a Senate document the opinion of the Supreme Court of March 29, 1937, on the constitutionality of section 75, subsection (s), of the Bankruptcy Act, as amended by the so-called Frazier-Lemke Act (Aug. 28, 1935, c. 792, 49 Stat. 943–945), being the case of Robert Page Wright, petitioner, against Vinton Branch of the Mountain Trust Bank of Roanoke, Va., et al., on certiorari to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is entered.

REPORT ON TRAFFIC CONDITIONS (S. DOC. NO. 48)

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a Senate document a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, dated March 23, 1937, with the accompanying preliminary report on traffic conditions and measures for their improvement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is entered.

CONGRESS, THE COURT, AND THE CONSTITUTION—ADDRESS BY SENATOR ROBINSON

[Mr. McADOO asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a radio address on the subject the Congress, the Court, and the Constitution, delivered by Senator ROBINSON on the evening of Mar. 30, 1937, which appears in the Appendix.]

REORGANIZATION OF FEDERAL JUDICIARY

[Mr. LEE asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an article appearing in the Oklahoma News of Sunday, Mar. 21, 1937, by John Alley, head of the department of government of the University of Oklahoma, regarding the President's proposal to reorganize the Federal judiciary, which appears in the Appendix.]

IDAHO'S PHOSPHATES—ADDRESS BY H. P. TAYLOR

[Mr. POPE asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an address on the subject of Idaho's Phosphates, delivered by H. P. Taylor at the Pacific Northwest Conference of the Farm Chemurgic Council, on Mar. 23, 1937, which appears in the Appendix.]

REGULATION OF BITUMINOUS-COAL INDUSTRY

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 4985) to regulate interstate commerce in bituminous coal, and for other purposes.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, when the Senate adjourned last evening we were inquiring about the provisions of this bill as they relate to the antitrust law. I am of the opinion that possibly we proceeded with the debate upon a wrong theory as to the effect of the amendment on page 47; at least, I had a wrong idea, to some extent. However, I find another provision in the bill which I wish to read in connection with the remarks which I have to make. It is found on page 14 and is as follows:

(d) No action complying with the provisions of this section taken while this act is in effect, by its terms, or within 60 days thereafter, by any code member or by any district board, or officer thereof, shall be construed to be within the prohibitions of the antitrust laws of the United States.

Mr. President, let us reread the Sherman antitrust law and inquire what possible reason there can be in dealing with this commodity, coal, to modify the terms of that act. That act reads in section 1:

Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is hereby declared to be illegal. Every person who shall make any such contract or engage in any such combination or conspiracy shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof—

And so forth. Section 2 reads:

Every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor—

And so forth.

Mr. President, we are dealing with a commodity which is essential to the health and comfort, and even the life, of millions of people in the United States. We are setting up a commission which shall have power to fix prices, maximum and minimum. What possible justification can there be, therefore, for going further and saying that all laws with reference to restraint of trade or with reference to building up monopolies shall be abrogated so far as this subject is involved? We are to have a commission which will increase prices and we are to permit monopolies and combinations to drive out the small producer.

The purpose of the bill, the objective to be attained, is an increase in price. It is contended that the life of the industry depends upon an increase in the price of the commodity produced. I am not prepared to dispute that suggestion, but a commission is being created for the purpose of passing upon the price of the commodity, and it is proposed that the commission shall establish a minimum price and, under certain circumstances, a maximum price. What can be the necessity or the justice of going further and saying that those for whom we are to establish a price shall have a right to make combinations and form conspiracies in restraint of trade and for the purpose of carrying on, through monopolistic practices, illegal transactions?

The amendment to which I am now referring, it seems to me, is a most extraordinary one. I refer now to the amendment as a whole. It will be recalled that the Supreme Court of the United States in the Appalachian case held that certain things were not within the Sherman antitrust law; for instance, that the right existed to agree upon a common agent, which common agent had a right to deal with the question of prices as between the competing parties. In this bill it is said, in effect, and I am not quoting the exact language, that the decision of the Supreme Court in that respect shall not be binding upon the members of the code, but that those who are not members of the code shall be bound by the decision of the Supreme Court. Let me read the language:

SEC. 12. Any combination between producers creating a marketing agency for the disposal of competitive coals in interstate commerce or in intrastate commerce directly affecting interstate commerce in coal at prices to be determined by such agency, or by the agreement of the producers operating through such agency, shall, after promulgation of the code provided for in section 4, be unlawful as a restraint of interstate trade and commerce within the provisions of the act of Congress of July 2, 1890, known as the Sherman Act, and acts amendatory and supplemental thereto, unless such producers have accepted the code provided for in section 4 and shall comply with its provisions.

It is said that the creating of this common agency for the purpose of expediting the trade and eliminating to some extent the controversies arising between the different producers shall be included within the terms of the Sherman antitrust law as to all those outside of the code, but that those who join the code shall not be bound by that provision. In other words, that is equivalent to saying that those who are not members of the code may not have a common agency to transact business, and so forth, although it has been held valid by the Supreme Court, but as to those within the code, they may have such a common agency or a common institution for the purpose of marketing their coal.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment. Let us bear in mind that the bill is opposed by a very large group of coal producers and coal operators. It is estimated that about 60 percent of the coal operators or the coal producers are in favor of the bill and some 40 percent are opposed to it. Is it common justice to say that that which the Court has held to be valid and expeditious and just as to marketing agencies shall obtain with reference to the 60 percent and shall not obtain with reference to the 40 percent?

I yield now to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. LOGAN. I think the Senator has answered my question before I asked it. The amendment takes from those who do not belong to the code the rights which were granted them by the opinion in the Appalachian coal case.

Mr. BORAH. It does.

Mr. BARKLEY. Oh, no, Mr. President; that is not correct. It leaves them where they are now and where they have been since that decision. It does not give any exemption from the Sherman antitrust law because they are not in the code.

Mr. BORAH. Perhaps the answer which I gave would create a wrong impression, but the provision has the same effect. What the provision does is to say that the creating of this common agency shall not be within the Sherman antitrust law; that it shall not apply to those who are outside of the code.

Mr. BARKLEY. It shall not apply to those who are inside the code.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly.

Mr. BARKLEY. There is quite a difference.

Mr. BORAH. No; not a great difference. We create by law a different status for two groups of people dealing in coal. That cannot be controverted. We say to one group, "You shall have a common agent", and to another group, "You shall not have a common agent", notwithstanding the fact we have a commission for the purpose of fixing rates, both minimum and maximum, and for dealing with the entire subject matter of the production and sale and distribution of coal.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. To the one group which we say may have a combination we say, "You are placed under the regulations of the bill", and in that sense they are distinguished from the other group.

Mr. BORAH. If that be true, then there is no occasion for this particular provision because the bill has already specified what their rights and duties and obligations are, and a commission is being created for the purpose of carrying into effect those things. That is provided for in the bill in numerous provisions preceding this one.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. In the Appalachian coal case the court decided that the particular marketing agency there set up was not an unreasonable restraint on interstate commerce in coal and, therefore, did not come within the Sherman antitrust law. The Supreme Court validated by its opinion, which was a reversal of the lower court, the existence of that marketing agency.

The bill only authorizes a combination in the formation of a marketing agency. That is all it does. It provides that any number of coal operators may adopt the code which is to be set up under the bill, which not only recognizes the principles written in the Sherman Antitrust Act but goes further and provides that those who submit themselves to the regulation of the coal commission are not subject to prosecution under the Sherman antitrust law for the combination and formation of a marketing agency which might be illegal in the technical sense if it were not for the fact that they are under the code. Those who do not come under the code, those who are unwilling to be regulated by this proposed law and by the commission set up under it, are left where they are now, subject to prosecution if they violate the antitrust law. It certainly is not fair to require the coal industry, which the bill recognizes——

Mr. BORAH. Let us observe the language and see whether that is the effect or not. The language is:

> Any combination between producers creating a marketing agency for the disposal of competitive coals in interstate commerce or in intrastate commerce directly affecting interstate commerce in coal at prices to be determined by such agency, or by the agreement of the producers operating through such agency, shall, after promulgation of the code provided for in section 4, be unlawful as a restraint of interstate trade and commerce within the provisions of the act of Congress of July 2, 1890, known as the Sherman Act, and acts amendatory and supplemental thereto.

The bill is not amending the Sherman antitrust law and saying that those things shall be lawful.

Mr. BARKLEY. It shall be unlawful, not as to those within the code and under the regulation of the commission, but only as to those outside of the code and outside of the regulation of the commission, and who have not accepted the terms of this bill.

Mr. BORAH. When we read that language in connection with the following provision on page 14—

> No action complying with the provisions of this section taken while this act is in effect, by its terms, or within 60 days thereafter, by any code member or by any district board, or officer thereof, shall be construed to be within the prohibitions of the antitrust laws of the United States.

If these two provisions do not take the coal industry out from under the Sherman antitrust law, then I am unable to construe what seems to me plain language.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. I think we all ought to bear in mind, in connection with this matter, that it is not proposed that there shall be any coal operators outside of the code; for there is not only the provision to which the Senator from Idaho has just referred, which seeks to lift the code members out from under the provisions of the antitrust statutes, but there is the tax in the nature of a penalty of 19½ percent levied upon the sales of noncode members. In other words, that is a coercive provision designed to make it absolutely essential, if one is to live in the business, to come in under these codes.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. NEELY. May I inquire what are the specific terms of the bill to which the Senator from Idaho objects on the ground that the acts which they authorize would constitute a violation of the Sherman antitrust law?

Mr. BORAH. I do not know that there is anything that constitutes a violation of the Sherman antitrust law. What I am speaking to are the provisions which repeal the Sherman antitrust law as to this business. Last night I went over the provisions with reference to what constitutes fair competition, and I have no objection whatever to those provisions. What I am discussing and hope to have seriously considered is the proposition that this commodity or this business is taken from under the Sherman antitrust law.

That is done after a tax has been levied for the purpose of driving in under the code all who are engaged in this business. I have upon my desk numerous letters from coal dealers, who say they must either come in or quit business; that they cannot live unless they come in. The result is, then, Senators, that we are entirely removing the Sherman antitrust law from this industry. Next will come the textile industry, and they will set up their commission, and they will have their men sitting on their commission. Next will come the steel industry. Next will come another industry; and eventually the country will be operating under commissions, with the Sherman law entirely repealed.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. MINTON. I desire to point out to the Senator that this bill does not repeal the Sherman antitrust law, but rather broadens the scope of its operation, in that it takes away the exemption accorded to those who operate as they did operate in the case which reached the Supreme Court, known as the Appalachian coal case. In other words, if this bill should go into effect, such a combination as that would be condemned and would be within the purview of the Antitrust Act. Therefore, instead of repealing the Antitrust Act, the scope of the Antitrust Act would be enlarged.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I think that would be true in a sense if it were not for the previous provision, found on page 14, which says that no acts of these persons shall be considered to be within the Sherman Antitrust Act.

Mr. MINTON. If they are not in it, the Senator means, they would be excluded from punishment?

Mr. BORAH. No; what I mean is that the provision reads:

> No action complying with the provisions of this section taken while this act is in effect, by its terms, or within 60 days thereafter, by any code member or by any district board, or officer thereof, shall be construed to be within the prohibitions of the antitrust laws of the United States.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is the section of the bill which authorizes the creation of district boards to be composed of code members and legalizes them. Certainly we would not undertake here, in dealing with the business of coal or any other business, to authorize the setting up of district boards composed of producers who are code members, permit them to do certain things as a board in the distribution and sale of their coal, and then leave them subject to prosecution if they do those things.

Mr. BORAH. I ask, then, is it true that the board members are expected to form combinations and conspiracies in restraint of trade? Is it expected that the board members shall form monopolies and carry on monopolistic practices? If it is not expected that they will do that, why exempt them from the operations of the bill?

Mr. BARKLEY. Not only do we not expect them to do that, but they are prohibited from doing it. In the very code we set up for them they are prohibited from forming unlawful combinations in restraint of trade, or in unreasonable restraint of trade. In the Appalachian case, where the combination merely related to the formation of a selling agency representing some 64 producers, a very large proportion of all the Applachian coal producers in the United States, the Court held that that form of selling agency, agreed to by these 64 companies, was not an unreasonable restraint of trade, and therefore did not come within the provisions of the Antitrust Act.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it must not be forgotten that these local boards may be constituted in their membership of coal producers, with the exception of one. There may be as many as 17 members of a board, and all but 1 of them may be coal producers, and they may make such findings and such proposals as they see fit. Is it to be said that the 16 members of the board who are coal producers may form combinations, or may carry on monopolistic practices, and shall not be subject to the law applying to monopolies?

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. NEELY. But the Senator, of course, realizes that the findings and determinations of the district boards to which he has referred are in every instance subject to the approval of the commission, whose members will be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, if the Senator from Idaho will permit me to make a further observation by way of illustration, if carriers wish to file tariffs for the transportation of commodities in interstate commerce, they may get together and agree upon tariffs and file them, but that does not mean that the tariffs go into effect unless they meet with the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Utilities file their rates—it does not make any difference whether they combine or do not combine—with the public service commission. The rates usually go into effect, under the laws, whether the commission passes on them or not if nobody raises a question regarding them; but they are always subject to the regulatory power of the commission. That is true under this bill.

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. MINTON. While the district boards composed of producers may get together and agree upon what is a minimum price and a fair price within their respective areas, that price is not absolute. It is subject, in its final analysis, to regulation by the commission.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the commission has a supervisory power, that is true; but 23 district boards are constituted by the bill, and their membership may be composed of the producers. What I am asking is this: If the proponents of the bill are afraid those men are going to violate the Sherman antitrust law, what is it they have in mind that the men may do? Why take the Sherman antitrust law off of them if it is anticipated that they are going to do something that is in violation of the Sherman antitrust law? What is it that it is expected they will do? There are very limited things which they can do which would come under the Sherman antitrust law. They cannot form monopolies.

They cannot form conspiracies in restraint of trade. They cannot make combinations in restraint of trade. Why is it that it is proposed to take the Sherman antitrust law off of them unless it is anticipated that they are going to do those very things?

Mr. MINTON. They might do those very things if they were not in some manner subjected to the regulatory power of the commission.

Mr. BORAH. Then if the regulatory power of the commission can take the Sherman antitrust law off of them, and if they are exempt when the regulatory power acts upon them, why permit them to indulge in criminal practice until they get to the regulatory power?

Mr. MINTON. It is not a criminal practice.

Mr. BORAH. Oh, yes; it is. The Sherman antitrust law is a criminal law.

Mr. MINTON. It is not a criminal practice, because this bill makes valid the thing they do if it is done under the supervision and direction and with the approval of the commission created by the bill. That could not be illegal. That could not be a violation of any criminal law; and to that extent I think the Senator is correct in saying that the Sherman antitrust law is limited. I think that proposition cannot be denied; but to the extent that the Sherman antitrust law is made to apply to those who do not come within the code, the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law are extended, and persons are brought in who otherwise would not be under the Sherman antitrust law. Of course, however, to the extent that we regulate, necessarily we do it at the expense of the Sherman antitrust law.

Mr. SCHWARTZ. Mr. President, I wonder if this amendment would not obviate the objection of the Senator:

In section 12, page 46, line 24, after the word "combination", insert "authorized by this section"; then, on page 47, in line 4, after the word "shall", insert the word "not"; and then strike out the clause beginning with the word "unless", in line 8; then the section would read:

> Any combination authorized by this section between producers * * * shall not, after promulgation of the code * * *, be unlawful as a restraint of interstate trade and commerce within the provisions of the act of Congress of July 2, 1890, known as the Sherman Act—

And so forth.

If that is done, we affirmatively limit the combination to one that is authorized by the code and provide that it shall not be a violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act, and we strike out all reference to those who are not within the code.

Mr. BORAH. I think that amendment is an improvement on anything that has been suggested, if I correctly understand it. The language is: "Any combination authorized"——

Mr. SCHWARTZ. "Authorized by this section." The remainder of the section specifically states what kind of a combination may be entered into.

Mr. BORAH. Under the suggestion of the Senator from Wyoming, the provision would read:

> Any combination authorized by this section between producers creating a marketing agency for the disposal of competitive coals in interstate commerce or intrastate commerce directly affecting interstate commerce in coal at prices to be determined by such agency * * *——

Mr. SCHWARTZ. "Shall not."

Mr. BORAH (continuing reading):

> shall not after the promulgation of this code provided for in section 4 be unlawful restraint of interstate trade and commerce within the provisions of the act—

And so forth.

That would hold that not to be unlawful which the Supreme Court has held unlawful.

Then we have the second paragraph, which has been called to my attention:

> Subject to the approval of the commission, a marketing agency may, as to its members, or such marketing agencies may, as between and among themselves, provide for the cooperative marketing of their coal, at prices not below the effective minimum prices nor above the effective maximum prices prescribed in accordance with section 4: Provided, That no such approval shall be granted by the commission unless it shall find that the agreement under which such agency or agencies propose to function (1) will not unreasonably restrict the supply of coal in interstate commerce, (2) will not prevent the public from receiving coal at fair and reasonable prices, (3) will not operate against the public interest, and (4) that each such agency and its members have agreed to observe the effective marketing regulations—

And so forth.

I should be inclined to accept the amendment which has been proposed by the able Senator from Wyoming as altogether helpful in construing this provision as I think it ought to be construed, in the protection of the outside operators. I am only interested in giving those who do not see fit to go into the code the same right which they have always had under the Sherman antitrust law, under the decisions of the Supreme Court, and I am of the opinion that under the clause on page 14 we would be permitting the local boards to trespass upon or to invade the principles of the Sherman antitrust law. So far as this particular amendment is concerned, I should accept the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. KING. I invite the attention of the Senator to the suggestion made by the Senator from Indiana. I may not have understood its implications, but, as I understood his statement—and I desire to obtain the view of the Senator from Idaho—it was to the effect that the marketing agreement referred to might be in violation of the Sherman antitrust law, but if those entering into it received the pontifical blessing of the commission, then the action would be validated, and the combination would be relieved of any criminal prosecution. Is not that the effect of the position taken by the Senator from Indiana? Would it not have that effect?

In other words, the marketing agreement might be monopolistic in character, might be intended to raise prices to the consumer, yet, if it were referred to the commission, and the commission approved of it, it would be validated and relieved of any criminality. I would like to have some explanation, because if the bill provides that a marketing agreement receiving the approval of the commission may be monopolistic in character, it seems to me we ought not to make any provision for the validation of acts which are monopolistic and in violation of the Sherman antitrust law.

Mr. BORAH. I did not understand the Senator from Indiana to go that far.

Mr. MINTON. I did not go that far.

Mr. KING. I so understood him. I hope I am in error.

Mr. MINTON. All I intended to say, and say now, is that when there is a desire to regulate an industry of this kind, necessarily there must be some control of what would otherwise be monopolistic practices.

Mr. KING. Then, Mr. President, if I understand the Senator, the statement I made a moment ago interpreting his former observation is correct. The Senator now takes the position, if I understand him, that there may be a combination between the producers; but in view of the fact that there must be regulation under the measure before us, and a commission is set up as the regulatory body, a supreme court, so to speak, if it validates the acts of the producers, though those acts will tend to monopoly, and, indeed, may create a monopoly, the validation by the commission relieves the producers of any criminal intent or a charge of violation of any act.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, if I may be permitted a further moment, the regulation under the bill is just like the regulation of utilities or any other thing of a similar nature that is regulated by States or the Federal Government. Everyone knows that utilities are monopolistic. There are two courses. We may enact laws to condemn and punish for monopolistic practices, or we may put the industry under regulation and control their activities, so that the monopolistic practices may not be injurious to the public. That is what the utility commissions do, and that is what the proposed coal commission would attempt to do.

Mr. BORAH. Do the laws regulating utilities repeal the Sherman antitrust law?

Mr. MINTON. No; because they do not go into interstate commerce.

Mr. BORAH. Some of them do.

Mr. MINTON. We are dealing now with regulation in a field in which we think the Federal Government has a right to operate, and therefore its power is analogous to the power exercised by the States in fields of regulation over utilities, and we regulate the monopolistic practices of utilities. That is exactly what utility commissions are set up for, to regulate the monopolistic practices of utilities, and that is all we are proposing to do by this measure—set up a regulatory power to control what, if left uncontrolled, may become monopolistic practices to the detriment of the public.

Mr. BORAH. I should interpose no opposition to the bill on the score which I am now discussing if it were confined to the question of regulation. It is proposed to set up a commission, as I have said. There are to be district boards. It is a very great scheme—and I speak with all respect—it is a very ambitious plan to regulate the industry. I am willing to concede, for the purpose of the argument, that it ought to be regulated in that way, that there ought to be some power to fix minimum prices and possibly maximum prices; but when that is being done, and there is established from the industry machinery for the purpose of regulating it, why is there so much caution to provide that the Sherman antitrust law, which prohibits monopoly, shall not apply?

Mr. President, I think I know where these provisions came from. They were insisted upon from the beginning by a certain group of men who are engaged in the coal industry, and, in my opinion, when we take into consideration the standard by which we measure prices—that is, the deadweight value—and then give them the monopolistic power which they may have under this measure, there will not be an independent operator alive in 10 years.

For instance, suppose there were a group of mines which produced at $2.10 a ton, and another group of mines which produced at $2 a ton, and another group which produced at $1.90 a ton. According to the standard which is fixed here, the $2.10-a-ton producer would have to go out of business.

If the provision should be "a fair and reasonable price", that would take care of the matter. But a standard is fixed which takes into consideration the three rates of producing, and then it is provided that the district boards which undertake to operate this machinery in its initiation shall not be subject to the antitrust laws, or to prosecution for monopolistic practices under the antitrust laws. Why not confine it to the question of regulation? Why not eliminate the question of antitrust laws?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, in order to make an effort, whether a successful one or not, to clarify the situation, I wish to go back to page 14, to which the Senator from Idaho has referred, or even a little further back than that. On page 11, part I, section 4, it is provided:

> Twenty-three district boards of code members shall be organized. Each district board shall consist of not less than 3 nor more than 17 members. The number of members of the district board shall, subject to the approval of the commission, be determined by the majority vote of the district tonnage during the calendar year 1936 represented at a meeting of the code members of the district called for the purpose of such determination and for the election of such district board; and all code members within the district shall be given notice of the time and place of the meeting. All but one of the members of the district board shall be code members or representatives of code members truly representative of all the mines of the district. The member of such producer members shall be an even number.

It goes on to describe the boards. It refers to the expense of operating and administering. This is what the boards would have the power to do:

> The district boards shall have power to adopt bylaws and rules of procedure, subject to approval of the Commission, and to appoint officers from within or without their own membership, to fix their terms and compensation, to provide for reports, and to employ such committees, employees, arbitrators, and other persons necessary to effectuate their purposes. Members of the district board shall serve, as such, without compensation but may be reimbursed for their reasonable expenses. The territorial boundaries or limits of the 23 districts are set forth in the schedule entitled "Schedule of Districts" and annexed to this act.
> Whenever the commission upon investigation instituted upon its own motion or upon petition of any code member, district board, State or political subdivision thereof, or the consumers' counsel, after hearing finds that the territorial boundaries or limits of any district or minimum-price area are such as to make it substantially impracticable to establish minimum prices—

It has power to reestablish the districts.

> (b) The expense of administering the code by the respective district boards shall be borne by the code members in the respective districts—

The district boards are set up to administer the code which is provided for in the bill, and which is to be entered into by all the members of the coal-producing fraternity who come under the terms of this measure as members of the code, and are controlled by its terms, which are set out somewhat in detail. The bill provides for the expenses of the different boards. Then, there is this provision:

> (c) Nothing contained in this act shall constitute the members of a district board partners for any purposes. Nor shall any member of a district board or officer thereof be liable in any manner to anyone for any act of any other member, officer, agent, or employee of the district board. Nor shall any member or officer of a district board, exercising reasonable diligence in the conduct of his duties under this act, be liable to anyone for any action or omission to act under this act except for his own willful misfeasance or for nonfeasance involving moral turpitude.

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, from what page is the Senator reading?

Mr. BARKLEY. I am reading from page 14.

The language sets out the powers of the boards generally. They have no initiative power so far as the conduct of the coal industry is concerned. It is their duty to administer the code set up by the bill through the board of which they have become members and under the jurisdiction and approval of the coal commission.

I continue reading:

> (d) No action complying with the provisions of this section taken while this act is in effect, by its terms, or within 60 days thereafter, by any code member or by any district board, or officer thereof, shall be construed to be within the prohibitions of the antitrust laws of the United States.

We are now recognizing in the bill that the coal industry occupies a special status; that it is so disorganized, so unstable, that from whatever cause there is so much chaos and confusion in the coal industry—an industry which is affected with a public interest—that legislation is required in order to stabilize it. In the process of stabilization we have undertaken to create 23 district boards. The bill undertakes to say what their duties shall be. All that this section on page 14 does is to provide that so long as the district boards comply with the provisions of this measure, under the jurisdiction of the coal commission, they shall not be regarded as being violators of the antitrust law.

It would certainly be most insincere and hypocritical on the part of Congress to authorize or even to encourage the producers of coal to enter these codes and arrangements, under the jurisdiction of a Federal board which must be presumed to be a board appointed and acting in the interest of the public, and then say, "You may do these things, but if you do them you are still subject to prosecution under the Sherman antitrust law."

How many coal producers of this country would enter into such an arrangement?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. What is it that the coal producers may do as members of a district board which would subject them to the Sherman antitrust law?

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not know what they might do that would be regarded as a violation of the antitrust law outside of the terms of this bill; but so long as they confine themselves to doing what is authorized in the bill they would not be guilty of violation of the antitrust law.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, at most it seems to me that simply makes the provision excepting the application of the Sherman antitrust law mere surplusage.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho referred to that matter in connection with the provision on page 47 of the bill, which I now wish to discuss.

I ask the Members of the Senate to bear in mind that the combination spoken of here is a combination only to the extent of agreeing on selling agencies. No combination is referred to there with respect to producing coal. No combination is referred to with respect to a reduction in the production of coal or an increase in the production of coal. It may be unfortunate that the bill uses the word "combination", which has some odium attached to it. However, in order to realize the situation with which we are confronted, we must recognize the fact that the combination referred to is only a combination among producers to form an identical selling agency for the sale and distribution of their product.

I should like to call to the Senator's attention the fact that the Sherman Antitrust Act forbids organizations and combinations in restraint of interstate commerce.

Under the rule of reason adopted by the the Supreme Court in the Appalachian coal cases, combinations of coal producers in the form of marketing agencies were held not to be, per se, unreasonable restrains on commerce and in violation of the Sherman Act. Although three judges in the circuit court of appeals below had unanimously decided that the combination or the selling agency created by the Appalachian coal producers, 64 in number, was a violation of the antitrust law, the Supreme Court reversed the decision and held that it was not an unreasonable restraint upon interstate commerce, and that the formation of these combinations per se within themselves did not constitute such a violation, implying, of course, if not stating, that the legality of the operations would depend upon the methods used by the producers in the performance of their duties. It might be possible for them to go outside the scope of their organization and really violate the antitrust law, but in the case before the Court it held that that was not a violation, because the organization of such a selling agency among the producers was not in itself a violation of the antitrust law.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. NEELY. Of course, the Senator from Kentucky remembers that the agency whose activities were approved in that case was one which was utterly destitute of any governmental regulation.

Mr. BARKLEY. Oh, yes.

Mr. NEELY. And the activities contemplated under the bill before the Senate are to be under the direct supervision of a commission whose members are to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. BARKLEY. I thank the Senator from West Virginia for his remarks.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. I have just refreshed my recollection as to the provisions of the Interstate Commerce Act, and its jurisdiction, and the exemptions from its jurisdiction. I find that by an act of Congress we have exempted the consolidation of railroads and the consolidation of motor carriers from the operations of the Sherman antitrust law. In other words, we have recognized in that great regulatory body just what we seek to recognize here. We have exempted certain practices that perhaps would have been monopolistic if carried on without restraint; but when we put the railroads and other organizations under the regulation of the Interstate Commerce Commission and gave the Commission supervision of the consolidation of railroads and the consolidation of motor carriers, of course we met a situation which caused the Congress to exempt those organizations from the operations of the Sherman Antitrust Act.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Indiana.

I should like to quote very briefly from the decision of the Supreme Court, because the language which it uses more fittingly describes the present condition in the coal industry than anything I can say independent of it. The Court said:

> The mere fact that the parties to an agreement eliminate competition between themselves is not enough to condemn it. * * *
> It is therefore necessary in this instance to consider the economic conditions peculiar to the coal industry.

That is what we are doing in this bill.

> The district court found that organized buying agencies and large consumers purchasing substantial tonnage "constitute unfavorable forces." "The highly organized and concentrated buying power which they control and the great abundance of coal available have contributed to make the market for coal a buyers' market for many years past.
> The court below also found that it was the expectation that similar agencies would be organized in other producing districts, including those which were competitive with Appalachian coal, and that it was "the particular purpose of the defendants in the Appalachian territory to secure such degree of control therein as would eliminate competition among the 73 percent of the commercial production."

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. In view of the fact that the commission is depended upon for so much in the way of holding coal operators within the Sherman antitrust law, I think certainly a majority of the commission ought to represent the public.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is not a matter now before us.

Mr. BORAH. It has a bearing on the question, because this whole argument is really based upon the proposition that this is a regulatory measure, and the commission is the supervising body with reference to it.

Mr. BARKLEY. That matter would be pertinent in connection with the formation of the commission itself, but it has only an indirect bearing upon this subject.

I continue to read from the decision:

> The evidence leaves no doubt of the existence of the evils at which defendants' plan was aimed—

This is the Supreme Court talking—

> The industry was in distress. It suffered from overexpansion and from a serious relative decline through the growing use of substitute fuels. It was afflicted by injurious practices within itself—

Certainly that is true now—> practices which demanded correction.

The Senator said that under this bill it might be possible that within 10 years there would not be any independent producers of coal. The life of this bill is only 4 years, as I recall, and if the conditions which now obtain in the production of coal shall continue without regulation or stabilization, in 4 years there will be no independent or small producers of coal in this country.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am not controverting that statement; I am only seeking that in doing this we do not give the industry the power to do things that it ought not to do against the public.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am in sympathy with that objective, of course.

I read further from the decision:

> If evil conditions could not be entirely cured, they at least might be alleviated. The unfortunate state of the industry would not justify any attempt unduly to restrain competition or to monopolize, but the existing situation prompted defendants to make, and the statute did not preclude them from making, an honest effort to remove abuses, to make competition fairer, and thus to promote the essential interests of commerce. When industry is grievously hurt, when producing concerns fail, when unemployment mounts and communities dependent upon profitable production are prostrated, the wells of commerce go dry * * *.
> The fact that the correction of abuses may tend to stabilize a business, or to produce fairer price levels, does not mean that the abuses should go uncorrected or that cooperative endeavor to correct them necessarily constitutes an unreasonable restraint of trade * * *."

So the Supreme Court in rendering that decision might almost be assumed to have had in mind the conditions of the coal industry in the United States at this time.

Mr. President, in drafting the bill now before the Senate it is obvious that it would not be sound policy for the Congress to adopt a law regulating individual coal producers, and at the same time leave combinations of producers unregulated.

There is a belief among substantial numbers of producers that cooperative selling of coal through marketing agencies will definitely aid in stabilizing the industry, and should therefore be encouraged.

In drafting this bill section 12 was drawn in such a way as to permit organization and operation of marketing agencies, but only under strict supervision of the coal commission. This purpose is accomplished by two separate paragraphs in section 12.

In the first paragraph it is provided, in order to make clear that the marketing agency and all its members come under commission control, that unless every member of the agency accepts the code and complies with its provisions, then the agency is per se in violation of the Sherman Act.

However, any agency which passes this first test must then meet the further requirements laid down in the second paragraph of the section. The plan of organization and operation must in each case be approved by the coal commission, and the agency must agree to abide by the commission's reasonable regulations. The second paragraph lays down clear tests, which not only comply with the broad language of the Sherman Act but even go further in detail. The following specific standards must be met in securing approval of the agreement under which the agency proposes to function:

First. That it will not unreasonably restrict the supply of coal in interstate commerce;

Second. That it will not prevent the public from receiving coal at fair and reasonable prices;

Third. That it will not work against the public interest; and Fourth. That each agency and its members must agree to observe the marketing regulations and the minimum and maximum prices established by the commission and otherwise conduct its business in conformity with reasonable regulations for the protection of the public interest to be prescribed by the commission.

It should also be borne in mind that an agreement cannot be entered into for the creation of these agencies to represent more than one producer without the approval of the commission, and the third paragraph of the section clearly vests authority in the commission to review and revoke or suspend any approval previously granted.

The section recognizes that marketing agencies have value. It recognizes the sound policy of the antitrust laws.

It refuses to permit marketing agencies to function unless every member of the agency has accepted the code laid down in the bill, and also requires approval by the commission of the plan of operation of the agency in accordance with detailed standards set forth in the section.

As a matter of practical operation, it substitutes for the lengthy and at times ineffective procedure of the courts a direct and adequate supervision by the coal commission. Before the full intent and effect of the section can be understood, all three paragraphs must be read and applied in the light of the language of the entire section.

In other words, Mr. President, the whole theory upon which this bill is based is that the coal industry needs stabilization; that it is a sick industry, and it has been a sick industry ever since the war, due, in large part, to the overdevelopment, probably, of coal properties and coal industries and coal deposits as a result of the high prices that ensued as a result of the war. Whatever may be the causes, the coal industry has been unstabilized and disorganized; it has been the subject of cutthroat competition of all forms and of practices designed and carried out by the stronger elements and units of the industry against the smaller and weaker units of the industry. The bill we are now undertaking to enact is designed to set up an agency which may supervise this industry in the interest of the industry itself, in the interest of the laborers who work for the industry, and in the interest of the general public.

In working out the processes by which the industry may be stabilized, the bill authorizes the creation of district boards; it authorizes and sets out in some detail the codes which the producers must enter and agree to; and then the bill provides that those who enter into this agreement, those who comply with the law that Congress may see fit to enact in order to stabilize their own industry in their own behalf and in behalf of the public, shall not, in addition, be subject to prosecution for a technical violation of the antitrust law if they do something we say they have a right to do under the law but which, without such a law, would be a technical violation and subject them to prosecution under the antitrust law. To eliminate that provision, it seems to me, would strike the very heart from this bill, because we cannot occupy the inconsistent position of inviting an industry to do certain things without saying, "If you do those things you will at least enjoy the protection of the reasonable regulations under the law which we have adopted and the administration of which we have committed to a public body created for that purpose, without fear that from some other source you may be harassed, prosecuted, and hindered in carrying out the provisions of the law we are now undertaking to enact."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if the discussion of this particular question has ended, I wish to make an inquiry of the chairman or other member of the committee. I do not desire to interject the question, however, into the subject under debate unless it has been concluded. Does the Senator from Idaho desire to speak on it further?

Mr. BORAH. On this particular amendment?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. I will only occupy a moment.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well. I will not ask the question until we have finished the particular matter under discussion.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, to deal with section 14 we will have to wait until the amendments have been disposed of, because section 14 is not an amendment; it is in the bill as it passed the House and has been reported by the committee without amendment. So I will not discuss the matter further.

However, I wish to ask if those in charge of the bill would be willing to accept the amendment suggested by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. SCHWARTZ]?

Mr. NEELY. That amendment cannot be accepted.

Mr. BORAH. That amendment, if adopted, would make section 12 read:

> Any combination authorized by this section between producers creating a marketing agency for the disposal of competitive coals in interstate commerce or in intrastate commerce directly affecting interstate commerce in coal at prices to be determined by such agency, or by the agreement of the producers operating through such agency, shall not, after promulgation of the code provided for in section 4, be unlawful as a restraint of trade.

May I ask, in all sincerity, what is the objection to that?

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, the sponsors of this bill painstakingly endeavored to bring the provision which is now under attack by the able Senator from Idaho within the purview of the language of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Appalachian case, which was read just a moment ago by the able Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY]. Those who are urging the passage of this bill believe that the amendment that has been offered would probably subject the bill, if it should become a law, to an attack that could not be justified by the language which the Supreme Court used in the Appalachian case. For that reason, we object to the amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Then I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that I will not discuss this matter further.

Mr. NEELY. May I inquire if the Senator from Idaho has an amendment which he wishes to offer at this time?

Mr. BORAH. I have proposed an amendment. I do not desire to discuss it any further at this time.

Mr. BARKLEY. Then, let us dispose of the pending amendment. If, however, the Senator from Nebraska wishes to discuss it, I will not insist on a vote.

Mr. NORRIS. I was unaware that there was an amendment pending. If there is one pending, I will call attention to the question I wish to raise after it shall have been disposed of.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, may we have a vote on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho, which, as I believe, was pending when the Senate adjourned yesterday?

Mr. BORAH. I withdraw that amendment and ask the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. SCHWARTZ] to offer his amendment, or, if agreeable to him, I, myself, will offer it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let the Chair state the parliamentary situation. There is pending an amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], and until that amendment is disposed of the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming would not be in order. If it is desired to vote upon that amendment when it shall have been acted upon, the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming will be in order.

Mr. NORRIS. May we have the amendment which was offered yesterday by the Senator from Maryland stated?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment which has been offered by the Senator from Maryland will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 12, on page 46, line 24, after the word "producers", it is proposed to insert "except as provided for in this act"; and on page 47, line 8, to strike out the words "unless such producers have accepted the code provided for in section 4 and shall comply with its provisions", so as to make the paragraph read:

> Any combination between producers, except as provided for in this act, creating a marketing agency for the disposal of competitive coal in interstate commerce or in intrastate commerce directly affecting interstate commerce in coal at prices to be determined by such agency, or by the agreement of producers operating through such agency, shall, after promulgation of the code provided for in section 4, be unlawful as a restraint of interstate trade and commerce within the provisions of the act of Congress of July 2, 1890, known as the Sherman Act, and acts amendatory and supplemental thereto.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I had intended to discuss the bill generally, but I realize that time is fast running and certain ceremonies are to take place during the afternoon, so I rise to speak only of the particular, specific amendment at this time, giving notice that before the bill comes to a final vote I desire to discuss generally the philosophy of the bill and perhaps its constitutionality, and to offer an amendment.

Referring to the particular committee amendment at the bottom of page 46, I ask the Senate to consider the amendment in its setting in a bill which does not merely involve regulation, does not merely involve supervision, does not merely lend sanction to a voluntary agreement entered into by competitors in the same line of business, but, beyond that, takes a very positive, definite step toward absolute authoritative command of the whole enterprise, the entire coal business. And then I ask the Senate to examine these words in the particular committee amendment on page 47, line 19:

> Will not unreasonably restrict the supply of coal in interstate commerce.

As bearing upon the question of whether the Congress can at all make such legislation valid.

Is not this particular element of the amendment an exceedingly dangerous element, in view of what we know has been the jurisprudence of the United States from the beginning of the Government down to this time? Does not this language in the amendment undertake to manage, by force of national power, the production of coal? Does it not nullify the effort which I know was earnestly and honestly attempted by the authors of the bill to bring it within constitutional limits? Is not a mistake being made here which it will be too late to correct if we do not correct it now? In other words, is not this a means of saying that there shall be Federal control of production if the restriction thereof is reasonable?

It is my theory that there cannot be even that degree of control of production which is regarded by anyone as reasonable. It is my proposition for consideration by the Senate that if the bill does in truth attempt the control of production even to a reasonable degree, it ought not to be passed, or at least that element in the bill should be removed from it before it is passed.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. Certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. Under clause (1) an unlimited amount of coal might be produced and yet not be supplied to interstate commerce through some combination to hold it off the market. All that does is to provide—

> That no such approval shall be granted by the commission unless it shall find that the agreement under which such agency or agencies propose to function (1) will not unreasonably restrict the supply of coal in interstate commerce.

That is almost the exact language of the Court in the Appalachian case, that the agreement entered into there to form a selling agency did not unreasonably restrict interstate commerce.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. AUSTIN. Certainly.

Mr. TYDINGS. Yesterday, during the confusion incident to the antitrust provisions of the bill, I offered an amendment in good faith, thinking it would be a meeting ground for both the opponents and proponents of the bill in regard to the matter then under discussion. I understand now the proponents of the bill feel that my amendment would not accomplish what they originally thought it would in that connection. I have no desire to tear the bill to pieces, and if they want the bill without the amendment I do not desire to offer it. Under my right, therefore, I ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland withdraws his amendment. No amendment is now pending.

Mr. AUSTIN. In order that my remarks may be applicable, I shall let them apply to the committee amendment, which probably will be the next question in order. Let me invite attention to the fact that, on page 54, the bill provides:

> (e) The term "marketing agency" shall include any association of coal producers or any corporation or other joint enterprise whose stockholders or members are coal producers, which association, corporation, or other joint enterprise exercises the functions of marketing or distributing coal.

We cannot read that paragraph of the bill very well without considering its setting and considering the other sections of the bill.

I believe that a fair interpretation applied by producers to the second paragraph, on page 47, would give them the right, if it is not barred by the Constitution, to agree to limit production going into interstate commerce for the purpose of stabilizing the price and the other features of the coal business.

That is all I care to say about the particular amendment. I object to the amendment because it contains that special feature of reasonable control of the production of coal. I object to it because it discriminates in favor of those who come into the monopoly created by the bill, that monopoly being not voluntary, but one that is coerced.

Later, as I have said, I shall want to discuss the bill generally.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, while the bill authorizes the formation of these agencies through the organization of associations or marketing agencies which produce coal, there is not a word in the amendment which authorizes any combination of any sort with respect to the production of coal. The mere use of the word "producers" is to describe those who now make arrangements for the sale and marketing of coal, and not for its production. It has no relationship whatever to the production of coal.

Mr. SCHWARTZ. Mr. President, I voted to report this bill favorably from the committee. It seemed to me the suggestion I made would clarify the thought of the Senator regarding this particular section. I realize, of course, that the suggested amendment would change the purpose of the section. I therefore do not care to offer the amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I will offer the amendment.

After the word "combination", on page 46, line 9, I move to insert the words "authorized by this section." On page 47—this is really one amendment—after the word "shall", in line 24, I move to insert the word "not", place a period after the word "thereto" in line 8, and strike out "unless such producers have accepted the code provided for in section 4 and shall comply with its provisions."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I move to strike out, beginning on page 46, in line 24, with the words "Any combination", and going down to the word "provisions" in line 10, on page 47. The amendment would strike out the entire paragraph.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the committee amendment, beginning on line 11, page 46, and going down to and including line 18 on page 48, being section 12.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, in the existing situation there is not much encouragement to a discussion of the bill by one who is opposed to it. There is not much object in discussing particular provisions of the bill when one's objections really go to the fundamental philosophy underlying the measure. I wish, however, to summarize just as briefly as I can my views with respect to the proposed legislation and make a matter of record the grounds of my opposition to it.

Mr. President, the declared purpose of the bill is the regulation of the sale and distribution of bituminous coal in interstate commerce. The reasons asserted as justifying this regulation are that present methods of marketing and distribution are wasteful of the coal resources of the Nation and that they disorganize and obstruct interstate commerce in coal.

In my opinion the bill goes far beyond its alleged purposes. The remedies proposed and the powers conferred have in them more of harm to our institutions and our people than do the conditions complained of.

What are the powers sought to be given by the bill?

There is authorized to be established in the Department of the Interior a bituminous coal commission. Among many other powers, this commission is authorized to prescribe minimum and maximum prices for coal. It is empowered also to prescribe marketing rules and regulations. It is authorized to fix maximum discounts that may be allowed code members. It is directed to formulate codes under which the whole industry is to be conducted.

These are the major powers through which the purposes of the proposed legislation are to be effected.

Mr. President, the power to fix minimum prices is, in my view, the cornerstone of this plan of control and aid. By the terms of the bill, each district board proposes a minimum price, free on board transportation facilities at the mine for the kinds, qualities, and sizes of coal produced in the board's district.

The prices proposed are to be such as to yield a return per net ton for each district equal as nearly as may be to the weighted average of the total costs per net ton. The computation of costs is to include the cost of items enumerated in the statute, among which are the wages of labor, the costs of workmen's compensation, and occupational diseases compensation. The several boards are directed, under rules and regulations to be established by the commission, to coordinate in consuming market areas, upon a fair competitive basis, the minimum prices and the rules and regulations proposed for the guidance of the industry. The commission is further empowered, whenever it deems it in the public interest, to establish maximum prices.

The infinite details which enter into price determination for the different kinds and qualities and sizes of coal in the 23 districts established, the computation of which involves labor costs, supplies, power, taxes, insurance, and other details, and the problems of price relationship as between the different districts, are all committed to the commission.

There is further conferred upon the commission the other far-flung power to promulgate codes. It is not easy to determine the precise powers of code making given to the commission. It is certain that the commission may establish the minimum and the maximum prices as heretofore mentioned. It has a reviewing power over the acts of the district boards; but this is indefinite, because of the indefiniteness of the board's powers. It has power to make marketing rules and regulations. The bill enumerates some 13 practices which are declared to constitute unfair methods of competition and to constitute code violations, and the commission is to hear and determine complaints of violations of this nature. The commission may require producers or distributors to maintain uniform systems of accounting of costs, wages, operations, sales, profits, losses, and other details.

It is within the truth to assert that within the bounds of this proposed legislation this commission and the codes established by it will become a dictatorial authority over this industry in all its ramified activities.

Mr. President, the purposes and powers thus very hastily sketched give to an agency of government the power to fix prices throughout the United States in this industry, and by devious provisions subject the coal producers of America to the rules and regulations of a governmental commission. The bill forces all producers to become code members through burdensome penalties, described as taxes, levied upon all who are without the code, and through the denial to nonmembers of the rights of cooperative marketing efforts afforded to code members. It seeks to exempt code members from our antitrust statutes and invokes these statutes against other persons. In my view, it attempts to assert commission authority over transactions properly belonging to our States.

Mr. President, I am against price-fixing by government. I am against the management of the business life of America by government. I am against monopoly by government, as I am against monopoly by industry. I am against the application of our antitrust statutes to noncode members and the exemption therefrom of code members. I am against the constant encroachment of government upon the social, the financial, the economic, and the industrial life of our people. I am against a socialized state here in America.

This bill, in my opinion, will result in unjustifiable profits to the company owning mines advantageously located geographically, with deposits susceptible of mining at low cost—the mines with efficient operations and management. It will artificially add to consumers' costs at a time when rising living costs already are sounding alarm to the people of this Nation. It is the beginning of the break-down of the anti-trust statutes of the United States. It is the longest step yet taken in this country along the road leading to the socialization of all industry here in America.

I am opposed to a piece of legislation having in it these inherent infirmities.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, it seems apparent that there is now an opportunity for me to express my views regarding the philosophy of the bill.

Mr. President, this bill, envisaged as a whole, presents to me a very definite trend. It seems to me that it is the most positive, clear-cut evidence of the direction in which a very large group in the United States are proceeding. I do not question their motives, I do not question their intelligence, and I even assert my own view with great diffidence, because one must admit that the United States of America is infected with the germ of political disease which has transformed Europe and Asia into two opposing camps of novel ideas; but in both camps one must observe that the underlying foundation principle is absolute authority. Apparently the disease has rendered governments of the Old World unable to govern any longer, and they have thrown up their hands and subjected themselves to the insistence of certain people that someone come in with authority, that some leader come forward with power, and make them secure. In other words, they have already parted with freedom, they have already voluntarily given up liberty, at the purchase price of what they thought would be security; and in that process they went through a type of economic evolution which corresponds so closely to that which is contemplated by the Guffey-Vinson bill that it seems to me we ought to pause before we accept its provisions.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATCH in the chair). Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator has stated the trend of the times to be to give up liberty in pursuit of security. I remind him that the very wise Benjamin Franklin suggested upon occasion that those who seek security at the expense of liberty probably will lose both.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Michigan for that reminder. I am one of those who believe that a frequent recurrence to fundamental principles is absolutely necessary in order to keep government free and to preserve the blessings of liberty, and that is one of the fundamental principles which it will do us good to recur to frequently today.

Specifically, the pending bill does what the cartels of Europe did, and we know that the cartels of Europe afforded Mussolini and Hitler the ready means, the equipment, the implements, with which to seize both sides of industry, capital on the one hand and organized labor on the other, and both capital and labor lost their liberty.

I shall call attention to this feature of the matter later in connection with a discussion by Matthew Woll, to which I shall try to refer, asserting the interest of labor in the present situation. It will become important to consider that because the proponents of the Guffey-Vinson coal bill assert that one of the principal objectives of the bill is to elevate, to raise up, the standards of living of the laboring man and to put him in a better position than the one in which he now finds himself in the coal industry.

It will not do to regard this measure solely from the point of view of coal, because the measure in its terms affects other things, and also because the measure, if enacted, will have repercussions throughout the economic structure of our country. Will producers of oil stand by and see the product which competes with their own product have the advantage of a rise in price by virtue of the exercise of the power of the Government at Washington upon the industry? To ask the question is to answer it, and there will ricochet from this bill the same theory upon all elements of industry which are touched by it. Even the boiler which contains copper and steel and iron will be affected by it, because there is a physical connection with the product that is controlled by the bill.

The peculiar thing about our situation is that we are not dealing merely with cartels among private producers of coal; we are taking a step beyond that, we are taking a step which brings us still nearer to the authoritarian state—that is, the state in which authority entirely supplants liberty—because by this measure we are now asked to surrender to the Government itself—that is, surrender to a commission which is to be an agency, a hand, of the Government—the most important element of management there is in the coal industry or in any industry under the sun; that is, control of prices.

The bill would enable the Government to say not merely what should be the minimum price charged by the members of the code but it also might fix the maximum price, and we are upon notice that in the fixing of the minimum price there are certain elements of cost which shall be put together, including labor, and that no minimum price shall be allowed or permitted which is less than the weighted average of costs in the district. This means something right away to the consuming public. The consumer is put upon notice at once that this is a bill contrived at the outset with full knowledge and eyes wide open to give to producers of coal a minimum price higher than they have ever received before, provided they are efficient, provided they have so managed their business and so equipped it with devices, and so brought it up to date that the cost of production for them is below the weighted cost. In other words, "This is, Mr. Consumer, a bill for the benefit of the strong." This is the kind of a bill which any great man in any industry would desire. It is a Christmas present to him.

Mr. President, I myself have been in business to a sufficient extent to know what this can do for the producers of a product which comes out of the ground. The little fellow, the inefficient fellow, sometimes he is called the "independent fellow", whose costs are necessarily higher than the costs of the big fellow, those whose costs are higher because they are less intelligent, less efficient, less industrious, and less careful—they will suffer by the enactment of the measure, unless the commission shall utterly and completely disregard the provisions which appear to be set forth in this measure. Why? Because the minimum price is weighted with their costs.

One does not need to have a great imagination to see what takes place the moment the commission considers a proposal of the members of the district boards. The members of the district boards come right out of the industry. They represent the producers and the miners, and they make a proposal which includes a finding of fact, which includes a statement of what the costs are, embracing labor and all the other elements which are set forth in the bill. They total the costs of the poor little man, they total the costs of the inefficient man, they total the costs of all who have been limping along trying to compete against a great fellow who already enjoys a certain amount of monopoly, and thereupon they make a minimum price.

Mr. President, how long will the little fellows last with the big fellow starting off at a minimum price which is arrived at by averaging all these different elements?

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. NEELY. If the Senator believes that the bill is favorable to the large producers and unfavorable to the small ones, will he not explain to the Senate why the largest producing companies in the United States are bitterly opposed to the enactment of the proposed legislation?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, that is an ad hominem argument. I would not undertake to answer it if I could, but I cannot. That is something beyond my cable-tow. I am discussing this measure not merely from the point of view of taking care of a temporarily bad condition in the industry, but in an effort to discover what its effect naturally is going to be in the long run. Where are we coming out with this thing? I see a picture of monopoly in its crudest form, monopoly that is encouraged by the State, monopoly that is aided and abetted by the State, monopoly that is managed by the State, because the State does that which is most effective in creating a monopoly—namely, fixes prices, maximum and minimum—and, of course, as is the history with every type of monopoly, the consumer pays the bill. When we wipe out competition entirely, when we suppress it, as we are bound to do by this type of legislation, the housewife feels the injury. Everyone who has to buy fuel feels the injury.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I have here a letter from a small operator protesting against this measure. It is addressed to a Member of the House who was a member of the committee which considered the bill. The writer says in his letter:

> Is it amiss to call your attention to the fact that you have never yet had before your committee any small operator to present his views on the bill? I go further and suggest that this law will start its ravages on the smaller mines of the industry very early in its control of the industry, and that it will have wiped out many mines before there can be heard in Congress sufficient cries for its proper amendment.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Idaho for that suggestion. The truth is that I have not had the advantage of listening to a single witness on the general character of this bill. I became a member of the committee only a short time ago, and all the testimony relating to the general character of the bill had already been submitted, and so I admit a deficiency in that respect. I have done such reading as I could do in the short time available to me and under the existing circumstances, having something else to do besides this. I have gathered the views I have from such study, and I must confess that perhaps I am more positive than I should be had I studied the testimony more thoroughly.

If these things are not reason, then they are not law. It seems to me that in considering legislation here we ought to be very careful about the effect upon the consumer in the matter of managing by Government the price of a necessity of life. We should always take into consideration that the maximum price or the minimum price, or any price that the Government fixes for this necessity of every house in the land, must be high enough to permit a fair return on the investment. Of course, that is good law. In that respect the bill complies with the holdings of the Supreme Court in many cases. If it did not do so, it undoubtedly would transgress the Constitution by depriving the citizens of this country of their property without any redress whatever, and by means of sheer force. But what about the consumer under this bill?

What is now proposed is not only a means of governing an industry but a means of stepping toward a political government of it, which some of us will never permit without objection. The centralized control of industry—one industry after another being acquired—is a means of centralizing government.

By depriving industries and the persons who constitute the personnel of those industries of their freedom and of their rights, and by subjecting them to authority, it is a means of subjecting them finally to political authority.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. BONE. The Senator from Vermont is an able lawyer. I wonder if he thinks, from his experience as an attorney, that the business enterprises of this country that are now subject to what we call regulation would be willing to have that system of regulation abandoned, and to go back as nearly as possible to a state of free competition in those businesses which, by their nature, are now made the object of regulation.

Mr. AUSTIN. Not at all; not at all. I do not believe in that. I believe in regulation. I know we have arrived at the point where free competition has already developed a certain amount of private monopoly which needs control. It needs supervision. I am in favor of that. I hope, some time before I leave Congress, to be a party to a bill having control of monopoly for its object, having in mind definitely to keep within the limits of power which are vested in us, as the Congress of the United States, by the people.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I shall not interrupt the Senator any more if he desires to speak without interruption.

Mr. AUSTIN. No; I am glad to have my friend from Washington interrupt me.

Mr. BONE. I am very much interested in this question, and I think every Member of Congress ought to be, because over the years we have made so many departures from the old laissez-faire doctrine that it is pretty hard to discern the boundaries of the theories we have adopted in recent years.

I am not authority for the statement that the figures I am about to quote are accurate; but along in 1931 or 1932 I saw a certain statement in a reputable financial journal. The statement was that some 500 corporations in the United States did 80 percent of all the business in dollars and cents, which, of course, would indicate a tremendous concentration of business control. To be sure, the ownership may have been diffused in a wide stock holding; but these corporate enterprises, these corporations which are in themselves entities under the law, had become masters of the field in which they operated; and that is the tendency in this country. If 500 corporations—if these figures be correct—do 80 percent of the business of the country, and that under the Sherman antitrust law, which has been in operation for 40 or 50 years—since 1890, I believe—if that process of integration has been going on unchecked, as it has been virtually unchecked, the passage of the bill under consideration will not add much in the way of development of that condition, or, at any rate, not enough to make us so highly critical of the situation, because Congress for years has permitted this integration to go on.

Mr. President, we have permitted the growth of vast combinations, such as the Telephone Trust, the power monopoly, and monopolies in other fields. I realize that many brilliant and able men will say that such monopolies were natural, and that they grew up without anybody being vicious or bad; that they simply served better in that field because they were monopolies; and, recognizing that fact, we set about to regulate them. Nevertheless, they are monopolies, even though they be subject to regulation.

Mr. BORAH. We did what we are doing in this case. We got up to the point where we struck the monopoly, and then we quit.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I and others on this side of the Chamber would be very thankful if the extremely interesting conference taking place on the other side of the Chamber were extended, and in voice loud enough so that we could know what it is.

Mr. BORAH. I should certainly like the Senator from Illinois to know what it is. Let me read, in connection with the remarks of the Senator from Washington, a statement from the opinion of Mr. Justice Brandeis in the case of Liggett against Lee:

> The data submitted in support of these conclusions indicate that in the United States the process of absorption has already advanced so far that perhaps two-thirds of our industrial wealth has passed from individual possession to the ownership of large corporations whose shares are dealt in on the stock exchange; that 200 nonbanking corporations, each with assets of $90,000,000, control directly about one-fourth of all our national wealth; and that their influence extends far beyond the assets under their direct control; that these 200 corporations, while nominally controlled by about 2,000 directors, are actually dominated by a few hundred persons—the negation of industrial democracy.

Let me ask the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Washington, What are these great corporations going to do with the regulators? They will regulate the regulators. There is only one remedy for monopoly, and that is to destroy it. It is not within the power of Government to regulate so great an enemy of economic freedom.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, am I intruding on the Senator?

Mr. AUSTIN. No, indeed. I am very much interested in the colloquy.

Mr. BONE. I am, and have been, very much interested in what the Senator from Idaho has said; and I got myself in trouble with numerous people in the West by employing those terms 20 years ago. I said that when any of these outfits were subjected to State regulation, the process would lead to the regulation of the regulators; that they would go into politics, and, being practical persons, would achieve the end they sought by the methods and mechanics of our political system. And that is precisely what happened. When it is undertaken to regulate a business such as that, it is not going to be regulated any more than it can help.

I very heartily agree with the conclusions of the Senator from Idaho and I think he has stated them as clearly as it is possible to state them; but as to the process of integration which the Senator from Vermont fears has been going on virtually unchecked in this country, let me say there are corporations with capitalization aggregating billions of dollars that have not been checked by the regulation which has been clamped down on them.

They make any rates they please, and if objection is made they go into court and fight to the last ditch. What I am about to say may shock the Senator from Vermont terribly; but when I was a small boy I used to read stories about the alchemists of the Middle Ages who claimed to possess the secret of transmuting base metals into gold. I never thought I would live long enough to see such a thing achieved in these modern times, but I have seen utility corporations, by the operation of the law and under this beautiful thing called "regulation", accomplish that very thing. They write millions and millions of dollars of wind and water into real capital value on which the people have to pay interest and dividends forever. I submit that whatever success the alchemists of the Middle Ages ever claimed to have achieved was just a milk-and-water affair compared to what has been done in these later days. When we can make phantom dollars into real dollars by the alchemy of legislation and court decisions and regulation, we do not need to teach our children that the alchemists of the Middle Ages were fakers. We make their performance very real right now, and those things will go on and on and on under the system of regulation we now have, which, apparently, well-meaning people are not challenging. I saw that in a case where a water company had invested something like $10,000,000 in a system, but under a judicial decree that was screwed up to $19,000,000. There is $9,000,000 of wind in that system, which was made very real by the alchemy of a judicial decree.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, how could a judicial decree do that?

Mr. BONE. Because a State regulatory body laid the foundation for it with the aid of clever engineers.

Mr. BORAH. State regulatory bodies, State legislatures, and the Congress repeal, emasculate, and destroy antimonopoly laws and then lay responsibility on the courts.

Mr. BONE. Oh, no. Let me give the Senator an illustration. I think the Senator from Idaho will agree with me——

Mr. AUSTIN. I hope the Senator from Washington will make his remarks brief.

Mr. BONE. My own State has a constitutional provision to the effect that no private monopoly shall ever be tolerated in the State of Washington; the Senator no doubt is familiar with it. The legislature passed a certificate of necessity and convenience act, which many of us protested. They said if Bill Smith has a certificate of necessity with the right to run a bus line nobody may go on that road, and if he does we will put him in jail. That was monopoly, made so by law. The Supreme Court sustained it and said that was proper under the constitution of the State of Washington.

I beg pardon of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. AUSTIN. I have been very much interested in what the Senator has said.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TRUMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. AUSTIN. Certainly, I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. NEELY. The Senator from Idaho has asked a number of interesting questions today, all of which I think have not been answered to his satisfaction. I trust he will press the Senator from Washington and the Senator from Vermont for a categorical reply to his question, What are the regulated eventually to do with the regulators? I hope the Senator from Idaho will follow that up.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I will follow it just so long as the Senator from West Virginia will go along and bear it.

My observation of conditions today in Asia and Europe, from visiting there, and from study——

Mr. KING. And from living there for a while.

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes; from living there for a while—is that great organizations of private capital were ultimately taken right over by Mussolini and also by Hitler. There was a period in the story when the private organizations were powerful and had an idea they were going to be able to control the government, and so in Germany they made an alliance with Hitler; but before their plans were finished he had those corporations right under his control and was able to command them.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes, for a moment; but not for a speech longer than my own.

Mr. BONE. Does not the Senator think there is very great danger here of the very thing he mentions in Germany and Italy unless we very realistically meet the problems of better wages and better adjustment of working conditions which are the ultimate purposes this bill seeks to achieve?

Mr. AUSTIN. That is really aside from the question relating to this bill. Of course, I want to see workingmen receive all they can possibly obtain; I am in favor of their conditions of living being raised; and, although they now occupy a position that is superior to that of any workmen anywhere else on earth, I would not say that that is the place to stop. I would say go forward and continue to improve the standard of living, and anything that I can do to help in that direction I am ready to do.

Mr. BONE. When coal prices are so low that coal is put on the car at the mouth of the mine at 40 cents per ton, there cannot be any possible hope of decent wages in an industry that has descended to such levels in many places.

Mr. AUSTIN. I am discussing the means attempted to be employed by this bill. I have already indicated my willingness to participate in an effort to obtain the objective to which my friend refers, but I should like to see it tried within the Constitution and consistent with our American form of government. I am opposed to seeing it tried according to the European plan, which already has demonstrated that it is death to free government and death to individual liberty. That is the proposition.

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President——

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. HOLT. There is nothing in this bill, is there, that would even guarantee the laboring man any better wages? In other words, that question is, in the long run, dependent entirely upon the producer, even if this bill passes, is it not?

Mr. AUSTIN. That is true, of course. There is a labor provision in this bill. I have no doubt that those who drafted the pending bill intended to eliminate that feature of the original Guffey bill, which was declared by the Supreme Court to be unconstitutional, but I think they have entirely failed to do so. I think the labor feature of the bill taints the whole measure. The labor provision contains everything that the Guffey bill embraced excepting clause (g), which related to wages, hours of labor, and so forth. It contains a provision that the employees of all producers of coal—not merely code members but all producers of coal—shall have the right to organize and to bargain collectively with respect to their hours of labor, wages, and working conditions, through representatives of their own choosing, without restraint, coercion, or interference on the part of the producers. That is hardly adequate, by the way; it should have read "without interference from any source whatever", and saved to the laborer a quantum of the freedom which he has not had saved to him under the bill.

There are other features of the labor provision which I say to labor may prove harmful. I have a right to speak for labor. For 18 years my firm was one of the few firms in a railroad city to take, on behalf of labor, suits against large corporations. I have come to the "palace of justice" in Washington on behalf of labor, and when I speak in the interest of labor here I do not want any man to rise and point to some case where I have represented the employer and say that, therefore, I am biased against labor.

I say these provisions, intended, without doubt, to benefit labor, are a harm to labor, and in the long run labor will find itself right where labor has found itself in Italy, in Germany, in Rumania, in Poland, and in Russia. There were fine, strong labor unions in Germany. What became of them? They were abolished by edict of the political power into whose hands they threw themselves, as labor in this country is today throwing itself into the hands of the Federal Government. Oh, would that there were a Gompers to stand up and protect labor against what is going on today and what is imbedded in this bill! Although it merely declares a public policy, yet if that policy is not put into effect a boycott is to fall upon the heads of employers whose employees fail to have it carried into effect.

The bill bristles with coercion. The penalty of 19½ percent on every sale will sink any producer who has to pay it; yet it is doubled and made 39 percent for certain violations. It is trebled under the damage clause. If any producer finds himself injured by a competitor on account of a violation of the code, he may bring a civil suit and recover treble damages.

Then there is imprisonment under the internal-revenue laws for the taxes which are penalties, as well as the taxes which are, perhaps, properly called taxes, though they are not in truth proper taxes, are brought under the internal-revenue laws and all their penalties.

Mr. President, I desire to consider the question whether it is desired to pass a bill which contains such a labor provision, right in the teeth of the judgment of the Supreme Court in the Carter coal case. Is there any Senator who doubts that the provision for bargaining collectively was declared unconstitutional in the Carter coal case? Does anyone within the sound of my voice doubt that to be so? Does anyone doubt that the labor provision is the one thing upon which there was no dissent? Six Justices agreed, and the other three said nothing about that provision in the Guffey bill; but those six said it was unconstitutional because the Federal Government could not reach into the State of Pennsylvania, for example, and regulate and operate production of coal there, and that when it came to a matter of controlling bargaining among the miners of coal, then Congress was undertaking to regulate and manage local production, which belongs entirely to the several States.

The State of Washington fought for that principle, and fought successfully for it. Within a few days we have had the decision of the Supreme Court holding that the State of Washington had the sovereign power to regulate such matters as hours of labor and wages and the matter of local production.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Where was there anything in the contention of the State of Washington or in the opinion of the Supreme Court which involved the question of the right of a State as opposed to the Federal Government in the matter of those activities which were not local in their nature?

Mr. AUSTIN. That is just the point exactly. The Federal law and the State statute cannot occupy the same field. One of them is supreme, as the Court has held time and time again. In Lemke v. Farmers Grain Co. (258 U. S. 50), in Baldwin v. Sedig (294 U. S. 511, 521), in Nebbia v. New York (291 U. S. 502), in Borden's Farm Products Co. v. Ten Eyck, February 10, 1936, and in the Carter case, the Supreme Court has recognized the doctrine that where sovereignty over local production may be exercised by the State itself, sovereignty over interstate commerce may not be exercised by the several States.

In the line of demarcation there is no confusion at all. The matter of production is outside of the reach of Federal power, and when a statute such as the one proposed here undertakes to say it is the policy of the Federal Government that employees of producers of coal shall have the right to organize and bargain collectively, and goes forward to impose other conditions upon their product, limitations upon their natural and common rights, and then adds boycott against the producer if he does not enforce those provisions, then I say that statute is knowingly willfully walking right into the Constitution, walking right into the teeth of the decision made upon an identical act.

Is that good legislation? I know, from sitting with those who are interested in the passage of this bill, that they do not want to take that hazard. I know they want a bill which will stand. That danger can be removed from the bill without hurting it. Someone said there is nothing in the bill that attempts to regulate wages. Then, why put something in the bill that simply makes a gesture at it, but makes a very bad gesture?

I invite attention to the language of a laborer, the great laborer Matthew Woll, vice president of the American Federation of Labor, and president of America's wage earners' protective conference. On February 24 last, in a radio broadcast, he made this statement. I shall not read it all, but only an excerpt bearing upon the point which I am discussing. He said:

> First, it should be made clear that the countries that today fall under the class of authoritarian states are Germany, Italy, Russia, Poland, Austria, Rumania, and, to a degree, Japan, with Spain hanging in the balance. Fascism, nazi-ism, and communism denote strict state control of the economic processes.

That is what we are designing. We are attempting now to make State control of economic processes in one industry relating to coal.

Mr. Woll continued:

> With the exception of communism, Fascist control was preceded in nearly all the other dictatorial powers by economic concentration. In Germany, Poland, and Austria, especially, concentration by economic power in the hands of combinations known as cartels preceded by a number of years the final concentration of economic power in the state. Indeed, it was centralization of the economic processes in the hands of compact private groups, in the form of cartels, which greatly facilitated the assumption of state control. Private groups devised and built up the machinery which came ready to hand for dictatorial usurpation at the proper time.
> These cartels were collective monopolies in which the constituent private concerns signed away to a central controlling body certain powers, such as price determination, limitation of production, and sales practices.

There is a dispute among us as to whether production is limited by the bill or intended to be so limited. It is my impression that it was intended to be limited within a reasonable degree, but certainly without controversy, price determination and sales practices are comprehended in the bill.

Mr. Woll continued:

> The existence of this undisputed economic power made the control of labor a comparatively easy matter. In Germany over 2,000 such cartels were in existence before the Hitler regime. In Poland probably 40 percent of industrial production fell under cartel control.

I am omitting some of his statements now, and taking up another section of Mr. Woll's address, where he said:

> In Italy, Mussolini, at first himself a radical though not a Communist, rallied support among the suffering masses, by vitriolic attacks on the concentrated economic power. On the other hand he aroused favor and support from members of the very order which he attacked because his ascendancy to power was looked upon as a rising bulwark against communism. Power was thus delivered into his hands by two opposing forces. Those workers who were not Communists, although greatly discontented, supplied the mass support. The industrialists and financiers, although opposed to his avowed policies, threw their strength behind him because he represented the only remaining hope against communism. Once in power, however, Mussolini dissolved the labor organizations, destroyed labor's freedom, abolished the right to strike, and, through corporate form, forced labor to his will. While industry was saved from communism, it, too, was forced to submit to curbs on its previous freedom of action. With the announcement of the totalitarian state Mussolini was supreme.

In Germany, a similar process was under way but the ultimate success of Hitler was delayed a decade. As in Italy, a strong communistic menace was present, as well as a leader who catered to the discontented masses. The industrial and business interests were opposed to him until he, too, came to represent a bulwark against communism.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. Let me finish this first, and then I will yield.

When by a succession of elections Hitler approached a majority vote, the powerful industrial interests held the balance of power. On one side was communism. On the other were the cartels, representing steel, chemicals, coal, and other powerful groups. Between the two was Hitler. By throwing their support to Hitler, the industrial and financial interests could throttle communism and control Hitler himself; and this control over Hitler meant control over his followers. The combination was effected. Hitler was catapulted into power and given dictatorial authority. Like Mussolini, he dissolved the labor organizations and set up the totalitarian state.

I now yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I wonder if the Senator does not believe that the growth of such things as the dictatorships he has described was the result of an economic breakdown which was the aftermath of the war.

Mr. AUSTIN. Partly that. I was undertaking to state what this great labor leader regards as the instrumentalities of centralization of political power. His doctrine is that to which I have been calling attention; namely, that the centralizations of economic power afford to a centralized government the means, the tools, with which to secure entire authority not only over business but over all the activities of the people. That is, the totalitarian state was made possible by and through these cartels of business, by and through these very compact organizations of labor.

Mr. BONE. I think a demoralization of business in any country, due to certain inherent evils in the business itself—I do not use the term "evils" in a moral sense but as meaning economic or financial evils that flow from a certain operation—is quite likely to bring about a demand for some sort of relief, whatever that may be, however intelligent it may be. We faced that sort of a break-down in this country; and, of course, the Senator is familiar with the declaration of his own party in 1932, when it said in its platform—

The fundamental problem of American agriculture is the control of production to such volume as will balance supply with demand.

To be logical, the Republican Party, had it been successful and done the extraordinary thing for a party to do—that is, to follow its own platform declarations—would have had to set up some kind of a Federal machine to bring about the thing it demanded, and which seemed perfectly logical.

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes. Mr. President, I will answer that in just a moment. Let me complete my reference to Matthew Woll. Then I will recur to that.

Mr. Woll makes an application to America in the following language:

We here in America are not free from the dangers that are world-wide in character, and which have as their ultimate objective world-wide control. Let the American people be aware and guard jealously those economic powers which by excessive concentration, both at home and across national lines, can gain a strategic balance of power against the forces of democracy, already so greatly weakened by trends and developments abroad.

That is all I care to refer to in Mr. Woll's address.

Recurring now to the remarks of the Senator from Washington, I think, as I said before, that there is no difficulty in the Federal Government exercising a regulatory power over interstate commerce. Why should there be? That is one of the things that were so important to the people of this country that they made an express grant of power for that purpose, and where there is a power I think there is a duty; and I will go along with the Senator from Washington in any reasonable plan of regulation of the coal industry or any other industry that crosses State lines and that has a public character, a public interest that justifies the exercise of regulation. I will go along with him, provided it is within the four corners of the Constitution, provided it is not against our constitutional philosophy and traditions. I do not want to support a plan, as I conceive this one to be, which centralizes in Washington management over a great industry by means of the power to fix prices top and bottom, not only of coal in interstate commerce but also of coal in intrastate commerce.

If this bill were limited to interstate commerce, it would have much more favor in my eyes than it has today; but there are features of the bill that crowd and reach and attempt to go beyond, by peculiar language, the commerce that runs and flows between the several States and the intrastate commerce that has a proximate influence upon interstate commerce, the commerce that is intrastate but has a direct effect upon interstate commerce. This bill seeks to overreach that. It seeks to create a new definition and to comprehend any matter or transaction in intrastate commerce that is in fact competitive with interstate commerce. I think that is going away beyond the powers which the people of this country vested in the Congress, and I shall offer a specific amendment upon that point.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes; I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I have been called from the Chamber upon several occasions, and I have not heard all the address of the Senator. Has he discussed the monopolistic features of the bill, particularly the point which was raised by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] earlier in the day, that there seemed to be an attempt, subtly or otherwise—I am inclined to think subtly—to exempt some of the organizations that may be created under the bill from the operation of the Sherman antitrust law?

Only since I came into the Chamber a little while ago have I had an opportunity to read the bill; but I cannot divorce from my mind the thought that it aims primarily to establish monopolistic control of the prices of coal so that the consumers throughout the United States will be penalized to the extent of perhaps one or two hundred million dollars a year. Has the Senator discussed the question of whether or not the Sherman antitrust law is emasculated, or any of its power withdrawn, under some of the provisions of the bill?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, perhaps not exactly that. I have alluded to section 12. As I understand the bill, it is a sort of back-handed slap at the Sherman Act, a sort of misinterpretation of it. In 1932 the Appalachian case sustained the legality of such a marketing agency as is described in the bill, without the necessity of approval by any Federal commission whatever. On page 31, however, to which section 12 refers, as I understand and interpret it, we find section 4–A, which leads us subtly, as the Senator says, out of interstate commerce and into possible intrastate commerce alone in the scope of this monopoly.

Of course any one who reads the bill sees plainly that this is a statutory monopoly. Clearly it is nothing but a statutory monopoly. Section 4–A on page 31, it seems to me, crowds and overreaches and tries to get outside of the constitutional limitations placed upon Congress with reference to the regulation of commerce. Listen to it:

Whenever the Commission upon investigation instituted upon its own motion or upon petition of any code member, district board, State or political subdivision thereof, or the consumers' counsel, after hearing finds that transactions in coal in intrastate commerce cause—any undue or unreasonable advantage, preference, or prejudice as between persons and localities in such commerce, on the one hand, and interstate commerce in coal on the other hand.

Then so-and-so shall be done.

I ask, Does not that seem to be an attempt to control and manage intrastate commerce if and when it possesses a natural advantage on account of the fact that it is in the State, and not across the State boundary? In other words, if a State is enriched by a natural deposit, and the State next to it has no such deposit, as between the two States, one of them has the monopoly—a natural monopoly of a natural product. Then this bill, as I interpret it, would come right into effect:

> Whenever the commission • • • finds that transactions in coal in intrastate commerce cause any undue or unreasonable advantage, preference, or prejudice—

Of course, it would be "undue"; of course, it would be "unreasonable"; and, of course, it would "prejudice", because there would not be any competition in it at all; it would be a monopoly, and between the absolute monopoly in a natural product due to geographical location and that remote limit of the least competition that could exist, where is the line to be drawn, and where is the Federal Government to step out of that limitation of its power which, in effect, says, "You cannot cross the State boundary and regulate the production of coal in my State"? Where is the Government to come in? By the proposed statute? I think this proposed statute could not be construed to permit the exercise of such a power validly.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, let us assume a situation of this character—and it is not fantastic—that in a given State there is a very rich deposit of coal, as there is in a number of States, where the coal vein, as in my State, for instance, in some parts of the State is 27 feet in thickness. The owner of the particular mine, we will assume, finds his market solely and exclusively with two or three smelters within the State; all of the output is sold to those two or three smelters. It is intrastate in the mining, it is intrastate in the shipment, it is intrastate in the consumption. Under the bill, would not an attempt be made to control the output of that mine to determine questions of labor and other conditions such as might be applied in purely interstate transactions?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, of course, I can do nothing but guess as to that. I would call the attention of the Senator from Utah to line 23 on page 51, relating to this subject. This is another committee amendment to which I intend to offer an amendment. It provides:

> Matters and transactions "directly affecting"—

In quotation marks, the Senator will observe—> interstate commerce in coal include those matters and transactions in intrastate commerce in coal which are substantially competitive in fact with matters and transactions in interstate commerce in coal.

What is the use of Congress reaching out in that blind manner and trying to do more than the Constitution allows? Why enact legislation reading like that, which no man sitting here who has heard the reading of it can understand? What is meant by "matters"? "Matters" are elements, perhaps. "Matters" may include oil. "Matters" may include electricity. "Matters" may include wood. "Matters" may include anything that will generate steam.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McADOO in the chair). Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not see how the Senator can put any such interpretation on this language, because it says "matters and transactions 'directly affecting' interstate commerce in coal"—nothing else but coal—"include those matters and transactions in intrastate commerce in coal"—and nothing else but coal.

Mr. AUSTIN. No; it is not limited to coal.

Mr. BARKLEY. It not only does not mention or intimate any other product, but it is limited to coal in each instance.

Mr. AUSTIN. On the contrary, it does not mean coal in connection with "matters." "Coal" modifies "commerce." It does not have a thing to do with the subject of this sentence. The subject of the sentence is "matters and transactions." When it comes to using the term "coal", this is the connection and the context of it: "Matters and transactions 'directly affecting' interstate commerce in coal."

That is to say, interstate commerce in coal is affected by "matters and transactions", and there is no limitation on "matters" and no limitation on "transactions", excepting that they affect interstate commerce in coal.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, this is the definition section of the bill.

Mr. AUSTIN. That is why it is dangerous.

Mr. BARKLEY. The definitions of the words refer, of course, to the language used elsewhere in the bill, and there are no matters and transactions referred to elsewhere in the bill relating to any commodity except coal by implication, and this is the definition of that phrase when applied to coal.

Mr. AUSTIN. I supposed this was a measure which had to do with certain objectives. Certain objectives are considered.

Mr. BARKLEY. With respect to coal.

Mr. AUSTIN. No; not with respect to coal.

Mr. BARKLEY. Oh, yes.

Mr. AUSTIN. No; with respect to labor, with respect to the miner, with respect to the consumer. There is a consumers' council provided for.

Mr. BARKLEY. It all pertains to coal, revolves around coal; it relates to nothing else but coal.

Mr. AUSTIN. Not at all.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator has not read the bill if he insists on such an interpretation.

Mr. AUSTIN. What I want the proponents of the bill to do is to limit it, but they have something here which reaches out to all matters which affect interstate commerce in coal. That is what they have. I wonder that the Senator does not see it.

My suggestion to the proponents of the bill ought to be accepted as beneficial, and not critical. Its sole objective from my point of view, is for their benefit, not mine. I am opposed in theory and principle to the bill, and the worse it is, according to my lights, of course the easier it would be to defeat; but I have offered this suggestion, and contend that if a bill is so written that the Supreme Court must declare it unconstitutional, then what is going to happen to the defenses which naturally would be set up against triple damages? What is going to happen to the defenses which would naturally be set up against the penalties? The penalties set up in the bill are grievous, they are harsh. An unconstitutional statute is no defense. I suggest this for consideration.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. It seems to me that the language does not sustain the contention of the Senator from Kentucky. If we were to construe the section as the Senator from Kentucky construes it, I think we would have to say that "matters and transactions 'directly affecting' interstate commerce in coal" are matters and transactions in interstate commerce in coal. That would conform with the meaning the Senator from Kentucky gives to the section. But it says only that the matters and transactions include matters and transactions in interstate commerce in coal, and it does not exclude any other matters and transactions whatsoever. Is not that correct?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, does not the Senator realize that this is a form of definition used frequently in legislation? It does not include an omnium gatherum for everything else on the face of the earth, and then wind up by saying it also includes coal. All we are dealing with is coal; and this definition is the definition of two or three words, a phrase, or a clause, "matters and transactions", so as to understand, wherever those words are used in the bill, that we apprehend what they are talking about; and the words are not used anywhere in the bill except as to coal.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, that might be reasserted many times, and the only way to settle it is to sit down calmly and read the bill carefully. I am willing to leave it to a calm reading of this section of the bill. I confess I see only one way to read it, and that is the way I have commented on it. But I have been wrong so many times in my life that I am willing always to have my work checked.

Mr. President, I intend to offer some amendments. Of course, I wish they might be favorably considered, but whether or not they are favorably considered, I intend to offer them, because I think it is the duty of the minority party here, holding views which it has declared definitely, and views in which it earnestly believes, to assert them on an occasion such as the present one, and when the opportunity shall be afforded I will offer these several amendments.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, personally I have no desire to engage in any lengthy discussion of the amendments which will be offered. I will say to the Senator frankly that it is our hope that the bill may be passed today, and that the Senate may adjourn over until Monday.

Mr. AUSTIN. If there is to be no discussion save an explanation of why I offer the amendments, I could offer them now.

Mr. BARKLEY. We still have half an hour.

Mr. AUSTIN. Does the Senator want me to offer the amendments now?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; we might occupy the time remaining.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment to the section last discussed. I ask to have it read at the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let the Chair state to the Senator from Vermont that the Senate is now considering the committee amendment in section 12, on page 46, and the Chair is informed that the amendment the Senator has sent to the desk does not have to do with the section under consideration. Therefore, with the permission of the Senator, the Chair will first put the question on the committee amendment found on page 46.

Mr. AUSTIN. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment in section 12, on page 46.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] will now be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. In lieu of the language contained in the committee amendment, beginning on page 51, line 23, and extending down to and including line 3, on page 52, being subsection (f), it is proposed to insert the following:

Intrastate commerce in coal which proximately affects the price of coal in the flow of interstate commerce is subject to regulation under this act.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, briefly, it seems to me there must be a substantial relation between the object sought to be attained and the provision set forth in the measure. The learned Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], for whose opinion I have high regard, says that the purpose of this bill is limited to interstate commerce in coal. I ask the Senate to consider whether the amendment I have offered does not do exactly the thing desired to be done, and limit the definition to commerce in coal. This is the definition of my amendment:

Intrastate commerce in coal which proximately affects the price of coal in the flow of interstate commerce is subject to regulation under this act.

That is what is claimed for the words which read:

(f) Matters and transactions "directly affecting" interstate commerce in coal include those matters and transactions in intrastate commerce in coal which are substantially competitive in fact with matters and transactions in interstate commerce in coal.

I am offering as a substitute for that very obscure language, concerning which the Senator from Kentucky and I disagree, a sentence which has a clear, definite meaning and a substantial relation to the objects sought by the bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, we have already discussed this matter. Our differences are irreconcilable as to the interpretation of the language. This is a definition section, referring to phrases that are used in other places in the bill. I still insist that they are intended simply to clarify the meaning of the phrase wherever found in the bill. The adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont will entirely interfere with the definition of the words we are seeking to define in this particular part of the bill; and I hope the amendment will be defeated.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I asked a question of the Senator from Vermont a moment ago and gave an illustration as a basis of the question. May I again advert to this matter. I am acquainted with coal districts which possess very thick veins and where the costs of mining the coal is less than the cost in other coal districts.

I am advised that substantially the entire output of several of the coal mines referred to is consumed in the State in which the coal is mined. The mining therefore is intrastate. There is competition because of the thick veins and favorable mining conditions and the coal can be produced and sold at prices considerably less than the cost of production in other mining sections.

By reason of these favorable conditions and the cheapness with which the coal is mined, transported, and sold, there is naturally competition with other coal regions, and in such competition some of the mines suffer from such competition.

My inquiry of the Senator is, in view of the condition briefly described, would not the coal mines, having these advantages, be subjected to the control of the organizations set up in the bill, even though in the production, distribution, and consumptions of coal there was no interstate commerce.

Mr. BARKLEY. There are several phases to the answer to that question. We have predicated this bill very largely upon a combination of decisions, one being the Shreveport case, in which the Court held that if intrastate commerce operates as a burden upon interstate commerce, Congress can regulate it; upon the Schechter case, in which the Court held by implication that if intrastate commerce directly affected interstate commerce, Congress could still regulate it. That is why the two words are in quotation. I myself do not see any need for the quotation. But it was put there in order to identify it with the interpretation of the Supreme Court in the Schechter case.

In the case cited by the Senator where the production is intrastate, the transportation is intrastate——

Mr. KING. And the consumption.

Mr. BARKLEY. And the consumption is intrastate—it is difficult to conceive how we could so affect the coal that is interstate as to bring it within the regulation of the commission, unless the practices with respect to the production, sale, or distribution of the coal intrastate were of such a character as to operate as a burden upon interstate commerce, coming into that same region from outside the State. In that case it might be possible to link it directly with the interstate coal business and bring it under the terms of regulation, because it is manifest that if any intrastate producer or if any combination of intrastate producers of coal could bring about such a condition to make it impossible for coal to be brought in from the outside and sold to the consumers, manifestly that would be such a burden upon interstate commerce as would cause such commerce to come within the regulation of the commission.

Mr. KING. Then if I understand the Senator, the State which has natural advantages over other States would be subjected to the same rules and regulations that apply in other States whose operations are marginal in character, when the costs of production are much greater.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, the only part of this bill that affects that is the provision concerning price areas, in which we have arbitrarily set off certain geographical regions within a price area. But these price areas and the prices to be fixed within them may be so adjusted and coordinated as to bring about a stabilization of the coal business in all these regions. It is not the purpose to have any sheer perpendicular lines drawn that would injuriously affect the coal production or distribution in any region of the country. The very object of the bill is to make it possible under the regulation of the commission to coordinate the coal business so as to give everybody a fair chance to do business.

Mr. NEELY. And also to improve conditions in the industry in all of the 26 coal-producing States of the Union.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I recognize the futility of prolonging discussion upon the bill under consideration. There are powerful forces back of the bill, and its passage is assured. That the coal industry has been in an unsatisfactory condition for many years cannot be denied, but, in my opinion, that does not justify the passage of a measure containing so many drastic and oppressive features as the bill under consideration. Indeed, it contains provisions which were found in the former so-called Guffey coal bill which was successfully challenged in the courts. The interstate commerce clause of the Constitution confers considerable power to regulate interstate commerce, but it does not, in my view, confer authority to coerce individuals and deprive them of their constitutional rights. There is a great deal of difference between regulation and coercion, and oppressive measures which interfere with legitimate business and abridge the rights of individuals.

It is regulation run riot that attempts to canalize industries, and to compress them into one pattern, and to shape their proceedings and activities into one form. The progress of our country has resulted from the enterprise and genius of the American people. They have not been compelled to walk in the same path subject to rigid rules and regulations aimed at uniformity and standardization. There has not been a cartel system controlled by Government or by bureaucratic agencies endowed with governmental authority. Deviation from old paths and the development of new methods and of improved technology have raised the productive power of the United States to unprecedented heights and brought rich rewards to the American people.

The material development of this Republic has been the wonder of the world and representatives of many countries have visited the United States in order to learn of the methods employed, the result of which has been phenomenal industrial development. Under our political and economic system there have been afforded, as I have indicated, wide fields within which energetic and ambitious persons—young and old—might achieve important results and win deserved triumphs. The Government has not attempted except in recent years regimentation or the placing of individuals and business under beaucratic authority. However, there has been of late a tendency to interpose obstacles to legitimate enterprise and to individual progress. There have been individuals who have looked to lands beyond the seas and to rules and regulations there imposed, and have sought to introduce into the United States those foreign and retrogressive policies which have hampered industrial and economic progress and development and have been restraints upon legitimate individual liberty. It has become an obsession with some that we should be regulated and grouped and controlled and placed under bureaucratic authority in our individual activities and generally in our industrial life.

There are those who would prevent competition and, as I have indicated, superimpose upon individuals and upon every form of business the regulatory hand of governmental agencies. There is a growing disposition to disregard individual rights and the responsibilities and, indeed, the authority of sovereign States. Appeals are made to have the Federal Government assume control over all forms of business and determine the policies—economic and political—which are to be observed by individuals, groups, communities, and States. There are some who see something magic and supernatural in the hand of Federal authority and in the touch of bureaucratic forces. We have multiplied Federal organizations until their voices are heard in the remotest part of the United States and their power is felt in every community and, for that matter, by nearly every individual in this broad land.

We are impatient when economic problems are presented and demand the termination of the same by the exercise of political and governmental authority. Too often there is a lack of confidence in the capacities of individuals to work out their own salvation and to meet and solve the problems encountered by communities and States, and by the Government itself. There are many who scoff at traditions, at precedents, of tried and proven institutions, and of sound and solid constitutional declarations. Departures from constitutional government are demanded under the pretext that exigencies have arisen which warrant such departures. It were well if the lessons of history were not forgotten, and the rich heritage of liberty and constitutional government were not ignored, or frittered away.

It is not my purpose to discuss constitutional questions or the perils which must inevitably flow from the abandonment of what I am pleased to call democratic principles and democratic institutions, for state socialism and for policies which lead to a totalitarian state.

I briefly refer to the interpretation placed by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] upon the provision of the bill which he discussed. I think he was substantially correct in stating that the provision referred to was designed to place intrastate activities in connection with coal mining and development under the control of the agencies set up by the bill. The provision attempts to expand the power and authority of the Federal Government in order that it may deal with matters which belong exclusively to the States or to individuals. That provision is a step in the direction of a cult which seeks the regimentation of the industrial life and activities of the people of the Republic by the Federal Government and the great army of bureaus and Federal employees, which are found in every part of the land.

Undoubtedly this measure seeks monopolistic control of one of the most important commodities of life, and this monopolistic control will cost the American people more than two hundred millions of dollars annually. Obviously the purpose of the bill is to increase the price of coal to the consumer, and the agencies which are created, will, I fear, be indifferent to the needs, and, indeed, rights of the consumers; and having the authority and the power, will be too much concerned in seeking advantages for the producers of coal and the various agencies aiding in its production and distribution.

Mr. President, not many years ago the American people revolted against the forces which sought monopolistic control of our economic and industrial life. The political parties responded to the demands of the people and declared from time to time, in their platforms that monopolies were harmful and, indeed, baneful things. Indeed, a strong declaration was made that a private monopoly was indefensible and intolerable. It seems to me that the measure before us not only will permit, but will result in monopolistic control of the bituminous-coal industry. Obviously it is sought by the measure to fix prices, and it contemplates the fixing of minimum wages. It seeks to revive important features of the N. R. A., regardless, as I believe, of the interest of the consuming public. But I shall not longer delay the Senate, other than to ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, as part of my remarks, two articles by Mr. John T. Flynn, a noted writer, appearing in the Daily News under date of March 30, and March 31, of this year, and excerpts from an article from the pen of Paul Mallon, in which they discuss the pending measure and various of its provisions and results that will inevitably follow if the bill becomes law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PLAIN ECONOMICS—CONGRESS WARNED TO MOVE SLOWLY IN ADOPTING SUCH MEASURES AS GUFFEY ACT, GIVING EMPLOYERS POWER TO REGULATE INDUSTRY

By John T. Flynn

NEW YORK.—In our system of government we have operated thus far upon the principle that all power over society resides in the people only by the representatives of the people.

If laws governing the economic life of the people are to be made, they should be made by the representatives of the people. This is the democratic principle. Perhaps in any given case no regulation of economic life should be undertaken. Men might easily differ about any regulation. But if the regulation is made, all believers in the democratic system will agree that it ought to be done only by the constituted legislators of the democratic society.

This principle is under attack all over the world today. In Italy, Germany, Austria, Portugal, and several other countries the principle is sneered at. And in this country there is a rising school which, while not sneering, is trying to force an entering wedge into this democratic structure in favor of an entirely new and different one.

This new idea is that the economic life of the people should be regulated not by Congress or legislatures, but by organizations of producers. This, I think, would be bad enough, but it is infinitely worse since they hold that the regulation should be made by representatives, not of all the producers in an industry, which includes the workers, but of the employers.

Of course they concede that this should be done under the "supervision" of the Government. But in practice this becomes a kind of necessary evil. And as the new system gets under way and is developed it is inevitable that the role of the Government, or at least of the democratic agencies in the Government, will grow less and less.

An example of this principle is the Guffey Act. Here the remedy proposed for the soft-coal industry is to organize it. It is to be regulated. It is to be subjected to price-fixing and production control. The machinery set up for this is to organize the employers into producers' associations or codes in each district. Each such group of producers will name their own boards. These boards are given legal status, although elected not by voters or citizens as such, but only by employers. They have the power to make rules and regulations having the force of law when approved by the commission, and it is intended that they shall get together and fix prices, subject to the approval of the commission.

The commission is a body which is to exercise Government supervision. But how much supervision there will be will depend entirely on the personnel and later on upon certain developmental factors which there is no space to examine here.

The worker is ignored. There is nothing about collective bargaining or living wage in the law. A lone provision provides that the district board shall have one worker representative, and as the boards may be as large as 17 members, it will be seen what a grim jest this is.

The point is that this is a beginning in the direction of recognizing the dangerous principle of so-called self-rule in business, which is the basis of the corporative state and is, as I have indicated, a departure from our traditional democratic technique. If we begin it we will have to develop along that road. This means that slowly we will find means to strengthen and extend and perfect that control of producer employers over our economic life. Congress should go mighty slow in setting its foot upon this new and perilous road.

PLAIN ECONOMICS—"TO SAY THAT THIS IS NOT TURNING THE ADMINISTRATION OF THE (COAL) INDUSTRY TO A TRADE ASSOCIATION OF PRIVATE PRODUCERS IS TO ATTEMPT TO ESCAPE THE PLAIN AND SIMPLE FACTS"

By John T. Flynn

NEW YORK.—At the moment one plan to revive the N. R. A. in a given industry is before the Senate. This is the much-discussed Guffey bituminous coal bill.

The essential and central idea in this bill is that found in the N. R. A.—to bring the coal industry under control thru the use of codes of practice. Under the N. R. A. producers in any given industry were formed into a code. The code was, in theory, prepared and adopted by the National Recovery Administration. In practice, however, it was prepared by the producers or employers and submitted to the N. R. A. for final adoption and proclamation by the President.

In this case a different rule has been followed. The code has been prepared in advance of the law and submitted to Congress and is incorporated in the bill.

Under the N. R. A., the code having been adopted, a code authority was set up, being named by the N. R. A. Or sometimes the N. R. A. permitted the code members to elect the code authority. There was an administrator, who was appointed by the N. R. A. itself. This code authority and the members of the code were then authorized to make certain rules and regulations affecting trade practices and in some cases prices and production.

In theory the code authorities did not actually fix prices, but merely made up schedules which had to be approved by the N. R. A. But in practice what happened was that the code authorities, producers themselves and representatives of producers, sat around and made up plans for fixing prices on their products. These were submitted to the N. R. A., which could accept or reject.

This is the actual pattern in the Guffey Act. The coal country is divided into 23 districts. In each district there is a code membership and a code authority. The code authority, however, is called the district board. And this district board is elected by the producers of the district.

In effect the producers of the district are formed into a trade association of private producers, which elects a board of directors, which becomes the code authority, endowed by law with certain definite powers under the law.

To say, as its proponents have, that this is not turning the administration of the industry over to a trade association of private producers is to attempt to escape the plain and simple facts.

The district board or code authority of private producers can make up schedules of prices. That is, the private producers can get together and take the first step in price fixing. It may also make rules and regulations about the sale of coal by members. Under this section it can make regulations which will regulate production as effectively as if quotas were fixed.

Of course, the bill's proponents say that the district boards can merely "propose" prices and rules and regulations and that the Bituminous Coal Commission has the final say. But the word "propose" is a euphemism. The price schedules and rules have to be approved by the commission just as the same regulations under the N. R. A. made by the code authorities had to be approved by the N. R. A. You might as well say that congressional committees take no part in legislation but merely "propose" laws, since Congress must approve and pass them. But in practice two-thirds of the laws passed are actually made by the committees.

The bill is a step in the direction of recognizing the principle that groups of employers should be recognized by the law as the proper bodies to govern the industries in which they participate. It is a dangerous principle and if once it gets a lodgment in our system, will, as it develops, result in widening and riveting the power of producing groups over our economic life.

GUFFEY-VINSON COAL BILL IS HELD MODEL FOR NEW N. R. A.

By Paul Mallon

The little-noticed Guffey-Vinson coal bill is supposed to contain a hidden key to President Roosevelt's N. R. A. revival plans. It passed the House last week without creating a ripple of interest. The debate dealt largely with extraneous matters. Leaders in charge neglected to offer the usual explanations of its provisions. Not even a record vote was taken.

Nevertheless, those who know more than they say publicly about administration plans believe the measure is likely to prove the model bill for the new approach to price fixing, maximum hours, and minimum wages.

Such a suspicion is bolstered by the announcements that John L. Lewis is now setting out to organize the electrical and oil industries. It has not been announced, but he also has his eye set on rubber, where the next break may come. His ally, Sidney Hillman, is going after textiles. The speed with which they are expanding is causing most observers to predict that the basic industries may be in his hands within a year.

If price-fixing codes are established for each of these industries along the lines of the coal bill, Mr. Roosevelt would have practicaly a new N. R. A., without packing the Supreme Court or rewriting the Constitution.

This Guffey-Vinson bill goes the whole way of the N. R. A. for the coal industry. It creates a national bituminous coal commission within the Government, and puts a sales tax of one-half of 1 percent on coal (raising about $4,000,000 a year) to support the commission. Self-supporting regional code committees are established. The antitrust law is suspended. Minimum prices are to be fixed, and, if necessary, maximum prices. A code establishing unfair methods of competition and marketing practices is written in the bill.

The only thing left out is the unconstitutional labor provision, but there is a trick in that. The new price fixing is to be done on a baisis of mining costs plus a fair return, and the bill says specifically that wage rates and hours of employment are to be considered in computing costs. That is all John Lewis will need.

The consumer may need something more. He is supposed to be protected by a consumers' counsel at the commission. The counsel will get $10,000 a year as a roving attorney for the consumer, but his power seems to be mainly that of objecting publicly by reporting to Congress.

Mr. KING. I also ask to have printed in the RECORD at this point a few excerpts from analysis made of the Guffey-Vinson coal bill, to which I have called attention, by E. M. Douthat, chairman of the committee, and opposing the present bill, which I understand are substantially correct.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

3. PRICE FIXING—OUTLINE OF PROCESS

The stated purpose of the bill, on its face, is to provide for the fixing of minimum prices on all coal sold in interstate commerce and in intrastate commerce where the intrastate sales directly affect interstate sales. All other sections and provisions of the bill are subordinate and related to the fixing of minimum prices.

The real purpose of the bill is to fix the minimum prices of coal at figures sufficient to support the existing or future wage structures. This real purpose does not have any relation to interstate commerce as such. Accordingly, minimum prices are based upon cost of production.

The cost of production on which prices are based is not that of the individual producer but is the weighted average cost of all producers whose mines are located in each of certain arbitrarily defined minimum-price areas. For instance, price area no. 1 includes all the coal produced in fields east of the Mississippi (excepting only Alabama) and Iowa west of the river. In this area substantially 90 percent of the annual national bituminous coal production is mined.

Certain so-called unfair trade practices are prohibited. The prohibited practices are designed solely to prevent evasion of the minimum price provisions.

The commission is authorized to fix maximum prices at a uniform level above minimum prices, but sufficient to permit each code member to earn all costs of production and sales, plus a reasonable profit. But there are no provisions in the bill giving the commission control of any item of cost.

* * * * * * *

The purpose and effect of this coordination are to establish a system of multiple basing points and to deprive consumers of the benefits which they might otherwise have from buying from producers located close to the markets or having low-production costs.

Such coordination will, of course, increase the return above the weighted average cost of the minimum-price area, but it cannot reduce the return to any district below the weighted average of the minimum-price area, unless necessary to prevent prejudice to the district, in which event a different basis for fixing prices can be adopted by the commission, subject to the limitation that the return for the district cannot be less than the production cost of all of the tonnage produced within the district.

There are a number of so-called standards which the commission is supposed to follow. The minimum prices are supposed to be "fair and equitable", "fair and competitive", not unduly "prejudicial or discriminatory"; they are to reflect "relative market values" at points of delivery in each consuming market area; and they are to afford the producers in the several districts "substantially the same opportunity to dispose of their coals upon a competitive basis as has heretofore existed."

As applied to minimum prices, these so-called standards are meaningless. In effect they authorize the commission to approve or fix any prices which, in its judgment, it thinks should be fixed.

It is significant that the basic factor for fixing minimum prices, namely, weighted average costs, in each minimum-price area, does not allow any return or profit to the producers as a whole. But, since an average cost is nobody's cost, the minimum prices may be expected to yield large profits to some of the low-cost or favorably located producers and substantial losses to some of the high-cost producers.

The commission is likewise given jurisdiction over the use of docks, storage and transportation facilities, and sales organizations of producers, for the purpose of preventing reductions in prices through lower transportation, handling or selling expenses.

4. ENFORCEMENT

On the face of the bill, the provisions of the code contained in section 4 may be accepted or not, as the producer chooses. However, the apparent right of election given to the producers is a patent fraud. The code is not intended to be a voluntary one but a compulsory one.

Compulsion is enforced through the following devices:

(a) If a producer does not accept the code and agree to abide by its terms, he is subject to a tax of 15 percent upon the selling price of all his coal, whether sold in interstate commerce or intrastate commerce. If he is a captive producer, that is, if the owner of the mine consumes the production thereof and does not make sale thereof, the tax is figured upon the fair value of the coal produced, as ascertained by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue (it is a mystery why captive producers are made subject to a price-regulation scheme when they, in fact, make no sales.

However, if a producer accepts the code, his tax is only 1½ percent. If a producer accepts the code and thereafter violates the same, he is subject to the 15-percent tax on all of his sales during the period of violation.

The Supreme Court has held, in the case of Carter v. Carter Coal Company, decided May 18, 1936, that this so-called tax is a penalty pure and simple and is not valid under the taxing power of Congress.

(b) The Government undertakes to boycott all producers who do not accept the code. The United States, and all departments and agencies thereof, are prohibited from buying coal unless produced at a code mine. Contractors performing public work or service for the United States, or for any department or agency thereof, are prohibited from buying coal for use in performing such work or service unless produced at a code mine.

* * * * * * *

(e) Code members who violate any provision of the code and injure any other code member are made liable for treble damages.

(f) If a producer accepts the code and violates it, the commission may bring an injunction proceeding against him in Federal court and enjoin continued violation, and thereby subject him to fine or imprisonment without trial by jury.

(g) If any producer fails to pay the tax, he is subjected to the monetary and criminal penalties applicable to failure to pay internal revenue taxes, these penalties being most severe.

(h) The Coal Commission is authorized to require detailed reports concerning the costs of production and distribution and any other information it wants. A producer failing to supply such information is liable to a monetary penalty of $50 per day.

* * * * * * *

The price provisions are substantially the same as were contained in the 1935 act. The regulatory provisions in the bill are intended to apply to all transactions in, or directly affecting, interstate commerce in bituminous coal. It is the expectation of the sponsors of the bill that the minimum prices will apply to substantially all coal produced, whether sold in interstate commerce or in intrastate commerce.

* * * * * * *

It is a certainty that the bill will increase substantially the prices of coal to the consumers over what these prices would be if open competition prevailed. If this were not the expectation, there would be no excuse for the adoption of the bill, and its real purpose would fail.

The provisions for administration of the price provisions, for uniform accounting and costs, for support of the district boards, the 1½-percent tax on code members, and the provision for coordinating delivered prices in different marketing areas, will add substantially to coal prices.

It is a disagreeable, but nevertheless true, fact that the higher coal prices are, the less coal will be sold and consumed. Oil, gas, and hydro power have already supplanted large tonnages of coal, and will supplant large additional tonnages if this bill is enacted. There is also active competition between bituminous coal, on the one hand, and anthracite coal and wood, on the other hand. Moreover, it is well known that increased delivered prices of coal bring about the installation of more efficient burning equipment, thereby decreasing the consumption of coal.

If production declines, production costs rise. Under this bill, the minimum prices would have to be increased to equal the higher cost.

But higher prices will result in a further restriction of demand and production, which will in turn bring about further increases in costs and higher prices.

Once this vicious circle of higher prices and higher costs is started, there is absolutely no way under the provisions of this bill whereby it can be broken.

* * * * * * *

* * * * * * *

Whatever general language and standards may be contained in the bill to control the actions of the commission, it is well recognized by everybody in the industry that the effect of the exercise of such power will be the determination by the commission of how much coal each district and each mine therein can produce, and the markets in which the coal produced can be sold. The power to fix minimum prices is likewise the power to exclude from commerce coal which cannot be sold for as much as the minimum prices. Power of this nature is too great to be entrusted to a governmental bureau.

In this connection attention is specifically called to the fact that the district boards are composed of representatives of producers, and that the members of the district boards can retain their connection with the producers by whom they are employed. This means that for most producers their minimum prices will be proposed by their competitors. The Commission will be controlled by the representatives of the operators and miners, they having four votes to the three other members not connected with the industry. They likewise are in a position to determine prices, production, and markets for their competitors.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, let us have a vote on the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I have another amendment to offer to this amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is it an amendment to the same committee amendment?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In lieu of the language contained in the committee amendment beginning on page 51, line 23, and extending down to and including line 3, on page 52, being subsection (f), it is proposed to insert the following:

Intrastate transactions in distribution and sale of coal, which are so intimately and inextricably connected with interstate transactions in distribution and sale of coal that the regulation of such interstate transactions cannot be accomplished effectively without discrimination against interstate commerce, shall be construed as directly affecting interstate commerce.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, just a word. The foundation of that amendment is the following language in the dissenting opinion of Mr. Chief Justice Hughes in the Carter case, namely:

The court below also found that "the interstate distribution and sale and the intrastate distribution and sale" of the coal are so "intimately and inextricably connected" that "the regulation of interstate transactions of distribution and sale cannot be accomplished effectively without discrimination against interstate commerce unless transactions of intrastate distribution and sale be regulated."

The purpose of the amendment is to try to make the statement in the minority opinion in that case the general rule.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, let us have a vote on the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the next committee amendment passed over.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 21, line 1, after the word "approximate", it is proposed to insert the words "and so far as practicable shall not be less than."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee which has just been read.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, just a moment. I have six other amendments to offer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the amendments which the Senator from Vermont desires to offer are not to the pending committee amendment.

Mr. AUSTIN. The Chair is correct.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee, which has been stated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment passed over will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 21, line 6, after the word "shall", it is proposed to strike out "thereupon" and insert "thereafter"; and in line 7, after the word "established", to insert "and from time to time, upon complaint or upon its own motion, review and revise", so as to read:

The minimum prices proposed as a result of such coordination shall not, as to any district, reduce or increase the return per net ton upon all the coal produced therein below or above the minimum return as provided in subsection (a) of this section by an amount greater than necessary to accomplish such coordination, to the end that the return per net ton upon the entire tonnage of the minimum price area shall approximate, and so far as practicable shall be not less than, the weighted average of the total costs per net ton of the tonnage of such minimum price area. Such coordinated prices and rules and regulations, together with the data upon which they are predicated, shall be submitted to the Commission. The Commission shall thereafter establish, and from time to time, upon complaint or upon its own motion, review and revise the effective minimum prices and rules and regulations in accordance with the standards set forth in subsections (a) and (b) of part II of this section.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 21, after line 11, to insert:

In the establishment of initial minimum prices and marketing rules and regulations, the Commission may proceed to establish such prices and regulations in any minimum price area and to make the same effective prior to like action for other price areas. The Commission may limit the application of established minimum and maximum prices in connection with contracts for the sale of coal to such periods of time as the Commission may by regulation prescribe.

On the petition of any district board or other party in interest or on its own motion, after notice to the district boards, the Commission may at any time conduct hearings to determine whether the minimum prices established in accordance with the foregoing provisions for any district are not in conformity with the standards hereinabove provided and are prejudicial to any district with respect to the fair opportunity of such district to market its coal. Should the Commission so find, it may take such action as is necessary to bring such prices into conformity with the standards and to remove the prejudice to such district.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 23, line 18, after the words "prior to", to strike out "January 6, 1937" and insert "June 16, 1933. Any contract made on or subsequent to said date which provides for a price below such established minimum price shall be unenforceable as to such price provision."

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I have an amendment to offer to that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the committee amendment, on page 23, line 19, it is proposed to strike out "June 16, 1933" and insert "the date of the approval of this act."

Mr. AUSTIN. Just a word of explanation. This is the portion of the bill which provides for the cancelation of contracts if the price specified in such contracts is greater or less than the price fixed by the Government. My amendment has for its objective to narrow the period of time to the date of the passage of the act; that is to say, that contracts heretofore entered into will be valid, whereas if the committee amendment should be adopted and the bill should pass in that form, it will be retroactive to 1933; that is, it will cancel all contracts made during the 3 or 4 years between June 16, 1933, and June 16, 1937.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I am not sure that there will be a record vote on this bill, and so I wish to say a few words regarding my attitude.

When the former Guffey coal bill was acted on by the Senate I voted against it solely because I thought the measure unconstitutional. I favored the purposes of the bill then, but, under the decisions of the Supreme Court, there was no doubt in my mind that that bill would be declared unconstitutional. It was declared unconstitutional. The pending bill, in my opinion, conforms to the Constitution, and I shall give it my support and vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] to the committee amendment on page 23, line 18.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, the date fixed in this bill under the committee amendment is the date on which the coal code took effect in 1933. If the committee amendment should be eliminated, and the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont should be adopted, it would mean that all contracts that have been entered into in anticipation of this legislation will be legalized, and, to a large extent, make it impossible for the commission to regulate the conduct of the coal business or for the law which we are about to pass to take effect. For that reason, I hope the amendment will be rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I offer several amendments, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 8, after line 15, it is proposed to insert the following:

The term "disposal" as used in this section includes consumption or use (whether in the production of coke or fuel, or otherwise) by a producer, and any transfer of title by the producer other than by sale.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the next amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 9, line 2, it is proposed to strike out the words "market value of such coal" and insert in lieu thereof the words "fair market value of such coal at the time of such disposal or sale."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator explain the reason for the change?

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, the four amendments I have offered are clarifying amendments which have been suggested by the Treasury Department to make the bill easier of interpretation in connection with the tax provisions. They are not offered on behalf of the committee, but entirely at the request of the Treasury Department.

Mr. KING. The amendment just proposed does not change the obligation?

Mr. GUFFEY. It does not change the obligation at all.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is merely in connection with the tax.

Mr. GUFFEY. Yes; it is in connection with the tax.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 40, line 14, it is proposed to strike out "section 600 of the Revenue Act of 1926" and insert "title IV of the Revenue Act of 1932, as amended."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania is to a committee amendment which has heretofore been agreed to. Without objection, the vote whereby the amendment was agreed to will be reconsidered. The Chair hears no objection. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the next amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 52, after line 8, it is proposed to insert a new paragraph, as follows:

(h) The term "United States" when used in a geographical sense includes only the States, the Territories of Alaska, and Hawaii, and the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I offer another amendment in behalf of the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] and the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of section 5 (a), on page 33, after line 8, it is proposed to add the following:

No producer shall by reason of his acceptance or reinstatement of membership become liable for breach of any contract the performance of which may be invalidated as a result of such acceptance or reinstatement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania explain, in a word, what the effect of that amendment will be?

Mr. GUFFEY. I was asked to offer the amendment by the two Senators from Alabama. I have not had time to consider the amendment carefully, but I think if it may be read again its effect will be understood.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be again stated.

The amendment was again stated.

Mr. GUFFEY. The amendment, if adopted, will protect the producer from any action against him from the invalidation of a contract. That is the object of the amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. And would protect him from the automatic invalidation by reason of the acceptance of the terms of this act?

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, does not the Senator from Idaho understand that that would be the law in any event, whether any such provision were inserted or not?

Mr. BORAH. That would be my understanding, and so I did not see any necessity for the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was agreed to.

RECEPTION OF THE GOVERNOR GENERAL OF CANADA

Mr. ROBINSON (at 3 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.). Mr. President, the Vice President, some hours ago, announced that a very distinguished visitor will call at the Senate this afternoon, the Governor General of Canada. In order that Senators may have an opportunity of meeting him informally, and that he may be permitted to express his appreciation of the opportunity afforded him, I now move that the Senate take a recess until called to order by the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and the Senate took a recess subject to the call of the Presiding Officer.

The Senate being in recess,

His Excellency Lord Tweedsmuir, Governor General of Canada, escorted by the committee appointed by the Vice President, consisting of Mr. ROBINSON, Mr. PITTMAN, and Mr. MCNARY, entered the Senate Chamber, accompanied by the Honorable Sir Ronald Lindsay, the British Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary accredited to the United States; the Honorable Sir Herbert Marler, Canadian Minister accredited to the United States; Hon. Norman Armour, American Minister to Canada; Hon. Julius C. Holmes, Assistant Chief of Protocol, United States; Mr. Redfern, secretary to the Governor General; Col. Willis O'Connor, aide to the Governor General, Captain Purnell, American naval aide; Colonel Crane, American military aide; Lieutenant Rivers-Smith, aide to the Governor General; Captain Campbell-Preston, aide to the Governor General; Mr. Richey, secretary to the Canadian Legation; and Mr. Spruks, of the State Department.

The Governor General of Canada having been seated to the right of the Vice President and the distinguished visitors accompanying him having been escorted to places assigned them on the Senate floor on the left side of the Chamber,

The VICE PRESIDENT said: Senators, I have the privilege of presenting to you His Excellency the Governor General of Canada. [Prolonged applause, Senators rising.]

The GOVERNOR GENERAL OF CANADA. Mr. Vice President and Senators, you have done me today a great kindness and a great honor for which I am deeply grateful. This is the culminating step in what has been a most memorable visit. I have had the opportunity, in a place I used to know well, of renewing many old friendships and making some new ones.

I am told, Senators, that I am supposed to say something to you today. A Governor General is in a very curious position. Once I was like you; I was a free and independent politician. [Laughter.] I could liberate my mind on any subject, anywhere, at any time, at any length I pleased. I had an official character, and, like you, I had also a private character. I need not remind you that a man's official character does not do justice as a rule to the stalwart virtues which he possesses as a private citizen. [Laughter.]

I remember in my own country on the Scottish border there was an old minister who once a month thought it his duty to deliver a sermon upon the terrors of hell, when he fairly dangled his congregation over the abyss; but, being a humane man, he liked to finish on a gentler note. He used to conclude thus: "Of course, my friends, ye understand that the Almighty is compelled to do things in his official capacity that he would scorn to do as a private individual." [Laughter.]

Senators, I am in the unfortunate position now of having no private capacity, but only an official one. I am unable to express my views upon any public question of any real importance, at least not for publication. But there is one subject on which even a Governor General may express his views, and that is my gratitude for your kindness here and my admiration for your great country. I have known America for many years. I have had the privilege of the friendship of many of your citizens. I have long been a lover of your history. I am quite sure that no American steeped in European history gets more of a thrill from Westminster Abbey than I get from Valley Forge and the Wilderness and the Shenandoah.

I have always believed that the secret of the future of civilization lies in the hands of the English-speaking people. I want these great nations not only to speak the same language but to think along the same lines, for that is the only true form of cooperation and friendship. I think that far too much is said about my country and yours being alike. It is much more important that they should be different. The strength of an alliance between two nations lies in the fact that they should be complementary to each other and each give the other something new. Therefore, I am always inclined to rejoice when I find great and real differences between your country and mine. But I think, when that has been said, that we have a wonderful basis for keeping together, especially on two grounds.

In the first place, we have the same definition of what constitutes greatness and goodness in human character. We admire the same qualities. We give our admiration and affection to the same type of leadership. Will anyone deny that your great men and our great men are singularly alike at bottom?

In the second place, we and you have the same tasks before us. I am especially struck in Canada to discover that nearly all our problems are paralleled by yours. We have the same economic problems. We have the same problems in the drought areas in the West. We have very similar constitutional problems and the task of harmonizing local interests and rights with national interests and duties.

Senators, I cannot imagine a greater bond between two nations than that they should engage in the same tasks and for the same purposes.

As I have said, I regard this afternoon as the culminating pleasure of a most delightful visit, and I offer you my sincerest thanks for your welcome today. [Prolonged applause, Senators rising.]

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I suggest that the Governor General of Canada stand in the area in front of the Vice President's desk in order that Senators and others may have the opportunity of greeting him personally.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If it is the pleasure of His Excellency, we shall be very glad to have that done.

The Governor General of Canada advanced to the area in front of the Vice President's desk, accompanied by the committee of Senators and by the Secretary of the Senate, and greeted the Members of the Senate as they were introduced to him by Mr. PITTMAN.

The Governor General of Canada and the distinguished visitors accompanying him were then escorted from the Chamber.

The VICE PRESIDENT (at 3 o'clock and 33 minutes p. m.) called the Senate to order, and the legislative session was resumed.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, during the recess of the Senate the Governor General of Canada appeared in the Senate Chamber, greeted Senators and others, and made an interesting and illuminating statement. I ask unanimous consent that the proceedings relating to the visit of the Governor General to the Senate Chamber, particularly including his remarks, be incorporated in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

REGULATION OF BITUMINOUS-COAL INDUSTRY

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 4985) to regulate interstate commerce in bituminous coal, and for other purposes.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 31, after line 5, and before section 4–A, it is proposed to insert the following:

(m) Anything herein to the contrary notwithstanding, no producer of bituminous coal shall be required to sell the coal produced by him at prices higher than will be sufficient to realize for such producer the aggregate cost of production and sale of such coal.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, briefly stated, this amendment is designed to protect the consumer. Under the bill the prices which each individual producer is required to charge for his coal are to be based not upon his own individual costs but upon the average of the costs of all the other producers, including his own costs, in the minimum-price area. N. R. A. statistics show that in the geographical area roughly corresponding to minimum price area no. 1 under the Vinson bill, the weighted average cost was approximately $1.85 per ton, whereas the individual producers' costs varied from approximately $1.52 to $3.18 per ton. This bill would require a producer whose cost was $1.52 to sell his coal on the $1.85 basis simply because other producers in his area have higher costs than he. Thus, by this bill, the consumers of coal will be deprived of the benefit of low-cost production by the efficient producer, and will be saddled with the higher costs of the inefficient producer.

Much more could be said on the subject; but I realize that the time is short, and I therefore have cut the explanation short.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the next amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 34, after line 12, it is proposed to insert the following:

The code shall be declared by the commission to be, and shall become, operative whenever acceptances for membership therein shall have been received from the producers of 66⅔ percent of the aggregate tonnage of bituminous coal determined by the commission to be subject to the provisions of this act.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, briefly stated, the objective of this amendment is to introduce into the proposed act the element of consent of the governed, which is, I believe, a fundamental principle of the Government of the United States, and which is excluded by the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the next amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 52, line 9, it is proposed to strike out the first sentence of section 18 and to insert the following:

Section 3 of this act shall become effective on the first day of the second calendar month after the enactment of this act, unless the commission shall not at that time have declared the code to be operative, in which event section 3 of this act shall become effective from and after the date when the commission shall have declared the code to be operative, which date shall be promulgated by Executive order of the President of the United States.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, this amendment has for its objective the promulgation of an agreement instead of the imposition of a mandate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the next amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 49, after line 24, it is proposed to insert the following:

Each producer shall file with the commission, on or before the 15th day of each calendar month, pursuant to regulations to be promulgated, and upon forms to be prescribed, by the Commission, a statement showing for the previous calendar month (a) the aggregate costs of production and sale of such producer; (b) the tonnage of each kind and size of coal shipped by such producer, whether individually or through an association, from each mine to each State, destination and use, and the free-on-board mines realization therefrom; (c) the average daily and monthly earnings of the persons continuously employed during the month in each occupation by such producer; (d) the average daily and monthly earnings of the persons not continuously employed during the month in each occupation by such producer; and (e) the average daily and monthly earnings of all persons employed during the month in each occupation by such producer.

The commission from such reports shall compile the data so obtained in composite form for each district and for all the districts, and on or before the 30th of each calendar month shall publish, and mail to each association and each producer at the address of such association or such producer on file with the commission, such compilation for the preceding calendar month. No such published compilation shall disclose any facts with respect to any individual producer.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, we claim that the consumer is entitled to know and entitled to have the means of finding out whether he is being exploited under the proposed act; and that is the purpose of the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert a subsection on page 44 between lines 12 and 13, as follows:

(e) It is further declared to be the public policy of the United States that no employee of any producer of coal whose employment has been terminated, or who for any reason has ceased to work for such producer, shall remain upon the property where he was employed after he has received written notice from such producer to leave such property.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, the first subsection of section 9 of the bill declares it to be the public policy of the United States, first, that employees shall have the right to bargain collectively with respect to hours of labor, wages, and working conditions.

Subsection 2 of section 9 provides that no producer shall interfere with or coerce employees in the exercise of such right, or discharge or discriminate against any employee for the exercise of such right.

The third subdivision declares that—

No employee of any producer and no one seeking employment shall be required as a condition of employment to join any association of employees for collective bargaining in the management of which the producer has any share or direction or control.

Those three paragraphs declare that it is the policy of the Government to favor collective bargaining, to protect an employee against discrimination because of his membership in a labor organization, and declare further that no employee shall be forced to join a so-called company union.

No penalty is provided, because of the decision of the Supreme Court, I assume. In any event, the section provides no penalty other than the penalty which would result from the prohibition against the Government entering into any contract for the purchase of coal from a producer who violates these provisions.

I am in favor of every one of these declarations in behalf of labor. I voted for the Guffey coal bill when it was before the Senate at the last session. I intend to vote for the pending bill. I voted for the Wagner bill. I voted for every labor measure giving to wage earners the protection referred to in the three subsections I have read. I am in favor of collective bargaining and opposed to the company union.

I think as a declaration of policy no one could well object to the further declaration contained in my amendment, providing merely that it is a further declaration of public policy of the United States that no employee of any producer of coal whose employment has terminated, or who for any reason has ceased to work for such producer, shall remain upon the property where he was employed after he has received written notice from the producer to leave such property.

I hope that the Members of the Senate in charge of the bill will see their way clear to agree to the amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from South Carolina whether or not a former employee, one who has been employed by a company and represents the other employees in their right of collective bargaining, would be denied a right to go on the property of the employer under this amendment.

Mr. BYRNES. Under the amendment, no one could be denied the right to go upon the property unless his employment had terminated, or if for any other reason he had ceased to work, and he had thereafter received written notice to leave the property. Unless the written notice were given him, the amendment would not affect him. If he was no longer in the employ of the company, were no longer working for the company, and remained upon the property, and written notice were given him to leave the property of the company, he would have to leave it. No penalty is provided, because the amendment conforms to the other provisions of the bill and is a declaration of policy.

Mr. DAVIS. Even though he represented the men who worked in the mine on a particular economic question?

Mr. BYRNES. If any man had been an employee but was no longer an employee, and came upon the property and was given written notice to remain off the property, he would come under the policy declared in the amendment.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield.

Mr. NEELY. I suppose that the amendment, if adopted, would cover the following situation: If a miner, because of intolerable working conditions, were to strike, and his employers were to serve notice on him immediately that because he had exercised his right to strike he was discharged from the company, he would then be within the condemnation of the amendment.

Mr. BYRNES. If he had notice to leave the property, no matter who he was, and remained upon the property, he would be in the position of a person remaining upon the Senator's property after notice to leave.

Mr. NEELY. Is it the Senator's intention to have the Senate, by passing on this amendment, express its approval or disapproval of the so-called sit-down strike?

Mr. BYRNES. The Senate by passing on the amendment would express its approval or disapproval of the language contained in the amendment, and nothing else.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, what does the language mean with reference to the sit-down strike?

Mr. BYRNES. The conclusion of the Senator from Idaho is for him to determine, because he and the Senator from West Virginia might have different views about what constitutes a sit-down strike. I answered the Senator from West Virginia that it would mean what the language says.

My construction of it would be just what the Senator from Idaho says. My construction of it would be that it would apply to any person who remained upon the property after receiving written notice to leave. If in a sit-down strike they did not receive written notice, it would not apply. If they did receive notice, it would apply.

Mr. BORAH. Under this amendment, if the owners of the property where the controversy is now going on should give notice to the employees to vacate, then the employees would be under obligation, so far as this provision contains any obligations at all, to vacate the premises.

Mr. BYRNES. Undoubtedly. Under the language of the section there is no penalty for the employers violating any of the sections which I have recited, I assume, because of the decision of the Supreme Court. I admit that there is no penalty in this amendment, because it follows the exact language of the three sections in the bill declaring a policy in favor of collective bargaining, against the company unions, and against discriminating against an employee because he belongs to a union.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the Senator contend that Congress has any power to legislate with reference to the so-called sit-down strike?

Mr. BYRNES. If the Congress has the power to legislate, as it is legislating in this bill under section 9, to declare a public policy, then it would have the same right to declare a policy in this additional section.

Mr. BARKLEY. Suppose that is granted, there may be some parts of this declaration of policy upon which Congress might have the power to legislate. I will not undertake to delineate them now, but I think it is probably conceded that under the decisions of the Supreme Court, and as a matter of fact under the Constitution itself, it may be legitimately doubted whether Congress can pass any law governing the vacation of property in an industry where the Supreme Court has said that the employment of labor is a legal matter over which Congress has no jurisdiction.

Of course, I doubt that this amendment would have binding effect on anybody if it were adopted. It is simply a declaration of the opinion of the Senate, and of the House if it should be adopted by the House, that they do not approve of the so-called sit-down strikes. But this language, it seems to me, is much broader than a mere denunciation or disapproval of the so-called sit-down strikes. It would apply to any individual, no matter under what circumstances he might have severed his connection with the employing company, although he resigned as an individual and not in concert with anybody else; if the company notifies him that he should not return upon the premises either for the purpose of securing employment again or for any other legitimate purpose, he would not have the moral right to go back on those premises, and then there would be no penalty attached if he did go on the premises. I am wondering whether, even if the Senate adopts an amendment of this sort, it is prepared to go to the extent of saying that in the case of any individual who is either fired or who voluntarily relinquishes his employment, if for any reason the previous employer should serve notice on him to get off or stay off to remain off the premises, whether he would be violating the spirit of this amendment if he went back on the premises for any purpose.

Mr. BYRNES. It would be very clear, I think, under the language that no employee shall remain upon the property where he was employed after he has received notice from such producer to leave such property.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does that mean that if he did not remain but went off immediately and stayed off for a day or two or a few days, that he could come back temporarily, or what is the interpretation to be given to the word "remain"? Is it that he must continuously remain on the premises without interruption?

Mr. BYRNES. I think the Senator could give the proper interpretation to the word "remain." That upon being given notice the employee shall not remain on the property of another person.

Mr. BARKLEY. Shall not remain. I suppose that means for an indefinite period.

Mr. BYRNES. An indefinite period.

Mr. BARKLEY. It may mean an hour, or it may mean a week, or any time. Of course, this is simply a declaration having no force and effect and binding on nobody. I do not suppose it will ever be interpreted. I do not suppose anyone would have any right to bring it into a court which would interpret it.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. Would it apply to a man who was occupying a company house?

Mr. BYRNES. It would apply to any person remaining upon property where he was employed—remaining on the property after receiving written notice to leave the property.

Mr. MINTON. Does that mean the place of work, or the property in which he lives or which he is occupying, and which belongs to the company?

Mr. BYRNES. The property where he was working.

Mr. BARKLEY. If he were living in a house owned by the producer, under the laws of the State it would be necessary to give him 30 days' notice to get out.

Mr. BYRNES. This amendment says property where he was employed. Referring to the Senator's suggestion as to a house, I do not suppose he would be employed in the house.

Mr. BARKLEY. He might not be actually employed in the house, but the house is furnished to him and he is required by the company to live in the house owned by it. I do not know what this language would mean with respect to that property.

Mr. BYRNES. It is very clear that it refers to the property where he was employed.

Mr. GUFFEY. In case a coal company is a large one, and operates over a wide area, owning thirty thousand or forty thousand acres of land, what is the employee going to do in case he is called upon to vacate his home? Is he going to be obliged to leave his home and be driven out into the cold of winter? Many coal companies own a great deal of land, and have their operations conducted on large areas which make it impossible decently to provide for their employees' comfort.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator another question. Does this amendment only apply to employees of coal companies?

Mr. BYRNES. Of course.

Mr. BARKLEY. Otherwise it would probably be subject to a point of order. It only applies to coal miners?

Mr. BYRNES. The language is the same as the other provisions in this section.

Mr. BARKLEY. I understand that. That raises the question whether we should make a declaration here with respect to a class of employees who have not been guilty of a sit-down strike?

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, if it applied to others there would be a point of order. We are attempting to make a declaration of policy as to the employees of producers of coal providing assurance to them of the right to bargain collectively; that there shall be no discrimination against them in that right; that there shall be no requirement that they join a company union; and for the same reason the amendment which I have offered would be entirely relevant and proper in this section.

However, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to modify the amendment because of the suggestion that has been made, in the fourth line, so as to strike out the word "where" and insert the words "upon which" so it will read:

Shall remain upon the property upon which he was employed.

So as to remove the question as to the house in which the employee lives, concerning which the Senator objects.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I think the real purpose of this resolution must be to condemn what is called the sit-down strike. I cannot understand any other purpose or objective. It may be that the Congress has power to deal with the sit-down strike, and perhaps it wants to deal with the sit-down strike, but there are a great many complicated questions arising out of that proposition which I should want to know more about than I know now if I were either going to condemn it or approve it. Let us deliberately find what we have the power to do and what we want to do and when we speak provide a remedy insofar as we can provide a remedy.

This is but a general statement that—

It is further declared to be the public policy of the United States that no employee of any producer of coal whose employment has been terminated or who for any reason has ceased to work for such producer shall remain upon the property where he was employed after he has received written notice from such producer to leave such property.

I take it that amendment would never be here if it had not been for the sit-down strike. So far as I am concerned, I am not going to vote to condemn the sit-down strike until I know all the facts and factors which enter into the question, both legal, moral, and economic.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I desire to make it clear that my vote is in accord with the views I expressed about section 9. I think it is ultra vires. I think we have no power to adopt section 9, either as it is now or as it would be with this amendment. For that reason I shall vote against the amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I do not approve of what is known as the sit-down strike. It has seemed to me that it is not a legal method of enforcing the demands of labor. This amendment, however, has received no consideration by any committee of the Senate. It is impossible of enforcement by Federal authority.

I should like to ask any Senator who has given study to the subject to say what the National Government would do in case a sit-down strike should occur in a coal field after the passage of this bill if it should include the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina.

It does not occur to me that there is any method by which any Senator, however much he may be opposed to the sit-down strike, can work out immediately a plan to enforce this policy. The language of the amendment, literally and fairly construed, means that should there occur a sit-down strike at any coal mine after the measure becomes a law, immediately following the service of the notice the laborer would have to vacate the premises. His home might be there; his wife and children might be on the property where he was employed. It is my understanding that such a situation exists with respect to thousands of miners in the United States. No arrangement is made in the amendment by which he could have a reasonable opportunity to remove his family from the property. After the notice is given he would become an outlaw instantly the notice was served.

I am willing to use the power of the National Government to suppress all forms of unfair labor practices both on the part of employers and on the part of employees. If we have the power to force discontinuance of such practices on the part of the employers as were described by the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] in his address yesterday, I should like to have that power invoked, and, if we have the power to enforce a policy respecting the sit-down strike, I am willing to use that power; we should treat both sides in these controversies fairly and justly. Here, however, we are asked by the Senator from South Carolina to say that when one, whose wife and whose children depend upon the continuance of his employment, is discharged for any reason he must immediately take himself, his wife, his children and his possessions and get off the property where he was employed, and if he does not do that he is contravening the policy which is sought to be defined by this amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I do not know what the condition is now, but in former years there were a great many instances in which employees were living in small houses and cabins on the property of the employer. Would not this amendment, if adopted, require him to leave his home and possessions if he was residing on the company's property?

Mr. ROBINSON. Immediately after the notice was served on him he would be compelled to leave. Let us be reasonable about the matter. Take the case of a miner with a wife and children living on the property where he works in a company house; his home is owned by the mining company and is on the property where he is employed——

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. And many of the companies require their employees to live in company houses in order that they may secure the work.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes. He is discharged from employment, rightly or wrongly. Certainly, we do not wish to declare by an act of Congress that every time a laborer is discharged from employment we will put the power of the National Government behind the employer and drive the employee out into the night, his family out into the storm without any means or opportunity for protection.

What does this language mean? Take a coal field in Pennsylvania, West Virginia, or in Arkansas where hundreds of employees live in company houses on the property where the miners are employed. For one reason or another a miner is discharged and notice is served on him. Where can he go?

Where can he take his wife and his children to live? Within 1 minute, according to the language of the amendment, after the notice is served on him he is an outlaw violating the policy of his national government. If he says, "Give me until tomorrow to find a new home, give me a chance to take my family to another cover", and he does not move, what is going to be done about it? Will any Senator rise and tell me? I ask the Senator from South Carolina to say what he would do about it. What would the National Government do?

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. STEIWER. As I read the language of the pending amendment it is merely a declaration of policy. It would seem that, so far as criminal action is concerned, the Federal Government could do nothing.

Mr. ROBINSON. Let me say——

Mr. STEIWER. May I go just a little further?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes.

Mr. STEIWER. I am not suggesting that as an answer to the Senator's argument. I rather think, on the whole, it makes the situation worse——

Mr. ROBINSON. That is what I was going to say.

Mr. STEIWER. Because it creates a situation where the operator might attempt to obtain a civil remedy in the Federal Court when he had no criminal remedy, and thus bring on ill feeling and misunderstanding, all without any definite accomplishment for anybody.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is exactly what I am trying to say.

Mr. STEIWER. I may have anticipated the Senator's argument, but it seems to me the Senator could go further, if he chose to do so, and say that the proposal might be hurtful to our judiciary as well as being unfair to employees.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; I think the Senator from Maine was right in the statement he made a little while ago.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Arkansas probably means the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. BARKLEY. The two are very close.

Mr. AUSTIN. It is all perfectly proper.

Mr. ROBINSON. I wish to assure the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Maine that I was not trying to be humorous when I confused Maine with Vermont. [Laughter.]

Mr. AUSTIN. I am much complimented by the reference.

The question I wanted to ask is, If this is an amendment to be added to section 9, then does not the employer immediately come under the hammer of the boycott which is provided in clause (b) and clause (c); that is, if he does not carry out the public policy is he not subject to being boycotted in his contracts with the United States Government?

Mr. ROBINSON. In all probability that is true, and that is another reason justifying the position I am attempting to take.

I should like to see justice done to everyone, but I do not believe that the Senator from South Carolina, without studying the question, without a committee having considered it, ought to try on this bill to settle the problems underlying the sit-down strike. One can conceive of great hardship both to employers and employees resulting from the amendment if it should be adopted. When we add to that the fact that no contention is made that there is any way in which to enforce the policy, we are compelled to reach the conclusion, from my standpoint, that it is an ill-considered proposition.

Much more could be said about the matter. If the Congress undertakes to legislate upon this subject, and if it is found that we have the authority to deal with it, we ought also to deal with other bad practices in the field of labor.

What is the power of the Federal Government as defined in the Supreme Court decisions and as defined by the laws of the country? First, what legislation can the Congress enact to enforce such a policy? I do not think we ought to enact legislation which we know and recognize as being without the power of the Federal Government to enforce. We can declare any policy that we choose, but it is bad practice to declare a policy, particularly when acute controversies have arisen or may arise, when there is no authority to carry out the policy.

I ask again, for the purpose of getting information, will someone tell me now what is to be done if the policy proposed in the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina should be violated or disregarded? What would be the effect of the violation? It would be to bring into further contempt and disregard the law, and it would bring the lawmaking authority into disrepute for acting in a sphere where it has no power to act.

Since I took the floor I have repeatedly asked Senators to tell me what they would do if such a provision of law were violated. We cannot "pass the buck" that way. We ought not to consider merely one side of this controversy and, as the Senator from Vermont has said, make a declaration that is ultra vires, and then say, "All right; we have said what we think about it. Now you can do what you please, and there is nothing we can do about it."

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. I am glad to yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Aside from all that, would it not be peculiarly unfair to declare such a policy in this bill, with respect to a class of employees who had not offended the policy, who had not engaged in the practice which is sought to be condemned?

Mr. ROBINSON. I suspect that every coal miner in the United States would say, "I have not engaged in a sit-down strike. Others have in other spheres of labor. No policy regarding them has been declared by Congress. But here I am singled out, I who have not undertaken to exercise or to claim any such alleged right, and I am told that if I do it I must, with the speed of the lightning, get out of the way, get off the property where I am employed, no matter for what reason I may be discharged?

Mr. President, it has been my duty to give much consideration to this subject, not only since sit-down strikes have become frequent during recent weeks but for many years. At one time I declared here that I was sympathetic with the principle of compulsory arbitration regarding controversies which interrupted or interfered with interstate commerce. Since that time the Supreme Court has held that not even a State has the power to compel arbitration, and so compulsory arbitration necessarily goes into the discard.

It is proposed now that when a miner is discharged, notwithstanding the fact that neither he nor his associates have claimed the right to sit down on the property, he must get off it immediately when served with notice to do so. It will not make for peace in industry. It will not assist in the settlement of industrial disputes. In my judgment, it is calculated to inflame and accentuate issues which we cannot settle here under existing conditions. If interstate commerce or Federal property were involved, if Federal laws were being violated, conditions would be different; but here is a condition which the courts have said is local, and which the Federal Government cannot resolve; yet we are asked and urged to say that our policy is to prevent the sit-down strike when we have no power to enforce the policy.

Mr. JOHNSON of California obtained the floor.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator from California yield to me?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Certainly.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas is disturbed about the possible effect of the amendment upon an employee, in that he might be forced to leave his home in the middle of the night, and, with wife and children, travel upon the highway. It never was intended that the amendment should have any such effect.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRNES. Yes; I will.

Mr. ROBINSON. The provision of the amendment is that the employee shall not remain on the property after he has been served with notice. Is not that correct?

Mr. BYRNES. No, Mr. President; the Senator evidently did not know that I had modified the amendment by substituting the words "upon which."

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not think that is material to this feature of the controversy.

Mr. BYRNES. I think it is. But, because the Senator does not think so, I am going to modify the amendment so that he can have no fear that a family will be forced on the highway. Therefore I ask leave to modify the amendment by adding at the end of it the language I have sent to the desk, and which I ask to have read by the clerk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The modification will be read.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator further modifies his amendment by adding the following proviso:

Provided, That this paragraph shall not apply to property occupied as a dwelling.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRNES. In 1 second. I desire to answer the other two statements of the Senator from Arkansas.

With reference to the Senator's question as to how the amendment would be enforced, I will say that the whole of section 9 is a declaration of policy. The first subsection is a declaration that it is the public policy of the United States that employees of producers of coal shall have the right to organize and to bargain collectively with respect to their hours of labor, wages, and working conditions through representatives of their own choosing, without restraint, coercion, or interference on the part of the producers. How is that subsection going to be enforced? I expect the amendment I have offered to be enforced in the same way that that subsection is enforced.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRNES. I will.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the Supreme Court should uphold the Wagner Labor Relations Act, which covers those very subjects, of course that part of the section would be enforceable.

Mr. BYRNES. The Senator from Kentucky is a very optimistic person. It may be that his optimism is justified, but the declaration of policy in the paragraph I have incorporated in this amendment would be enforced only if the other paragraphs can be enforced and in the same way.

There is another subsection of section 9 stating that there shall be no discrimination against an employee because of his membership in an organization. How is that subsection to be enforced? I hope it will be enforced.

It is further declared to be the policy of the United States that no employee shall be required to join a company union. I am opposed to the company union. I hope that declaration can be enforced; and the very same language is used in the amendment I have offered.

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] first said that he did not know whether or not he would vote for the amendment because he was opposed to the other provisions of the section, and then later he feared that it might have reference to and might be affected by the boycott section. The Senator from Vermont is a very good lawyer. He will admit it. The language of the section reads as follows:

No coal (except coal with respect to which no bid is required by law prior to purchase thereof) shall be purchased by the United States, or by any department or agency thereof, produced at any mine where the producer failed at the time of the production of such coal to accord to his or its employees the rights set forth in subsection (a) of this section—

Subsection (a); and the section sent to the desk is subsection (e), and not (a). As the boycott provision specifically refers to subsection (a), it certainly would not apply to subsection (e).

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, will the Senator now yield?

Mr. BYRNES. Yes; I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I should like to submit this consideration to the Senator from South Carolina, and I wish to say to the Senator that I do it with no element of flippancy at all:

The Senator offered an amendment which stated a policy of Government upon an issue which, if we may believe the newspapers and may believe some of the statements made upon this floor, many people in this country believe to be the most important issue confronting the country today. Within 20 minutes after the amendment was submitted, the Senator from South Carolina, as its author, found it necessary to make two amendments to the statement of policy. I submit this inquiry to the Senator from South Carolina: Should he ask the Senate of the United States to adopt a declaration of policy upon this important question, when the declaration which he prepared he found it necessary to amend twice within 20 minutes? Is not that in itself an indication that sufficient consideration has not been given to the subject by the Senator in the preparation of his declaration, and that it cannot possibly have been given sufficient consideration by the Senate?

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Washington is aware, from what I said only a few moments ago, that I did not deem the proviso necessary; but in view of the argument made by my good friend the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], I intended that there should be no doubt that the amendment did not apply to a dwelling, and therefore I made it beyond all reasonable doubt.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRNES. In just a moment. I know of no reason, however, why the Senator from Washington and the other Members of the Senate should not give to this amendment the consideration it deserves. If the Senator from Washington believes the amendment is of the importance he says, there is no reason why he and all other Members of the Senate cannot consider the amendment during the night, and tomorrow, and for such further time as is necessary to enable the Senator to make up his mind as to whether or not it is a wise policy to declare that if persons are employed upon his property, and their employment is terminated, and he gives them written notice to leave, they should leave. If the Senator's mind is not made up on that subject, and he desires time to consider it, we have time in which to consider it. The Congress is not going to adjourn tonight. There is no reason why adequate time should not be given for its consideration.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator now yield?

Mr. BYRNES. I will.

Mr. ROBINSON. While the Senator in his last remarks has passed beyond the point I had in mind, it is recalled that he implied, when he justified offering the amendment, that he thought the criticism I had made of his amendment was rather far-fetched, but that he was making a concession to me because of the far-fetched suggestion I had made. I now ask the Senator whether the original language of the amendment would not have embraced the home of a miner if it was on the property where he was employed; and if not, why?

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I stated originally that I had no idea that the amendment would have done so. It was my thought that it did not. And I called the attention of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] to the fact that the use of the language "upon which he was employed" in my opinion made the meaning clear. When, however, the Senator from Kentucky did not believe it was clear, I amended the language in order to make it clear, and certainly now there can be no doubt about the clarity of the language in the proviso excepting the dwelling house of the employee.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRNES. Yes.

Mr. MINTON. I agree with the Senator that there is not any way in which any of the provisions of section 9 can be enforced. We might just as well have written in the Ten Commandments so far as effectiveness in enforcing the section is concerned. Therefore I am against the Senator's amendment, because I am against "packing" the bill.

Mr. BYRNES. I thought the Senator was asking a question.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] really has the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. I desire to ask the Senator from South Carolina a question.

In all the legislation we have heretofore enacted dealing with the relationship between employer and employee, such as the Railway Labor Act, declared last Monday to be constitutional, the Wagner Labor Relations Act, and all other legislation undertaking to provide machinery for the composition of differences between employer and employee, extensive hearings were held before committees where both sides could be represented and be heard, and where deliberate consideration could be given to the matter before the Senate or the House was asked to pass upon it.

It seems to me that none of those matters was of greater importance than the matter which is now under debate. Does the Senator really think that we are in any position, without hearing both sides of this matter and having it considered by a committee, and after a minute investigation of the implications and ramifications which have resulted in this sit-down strike situation, even intelligently to declare a policy on the subject, much less when we cannot follow it up with any legislation legalizing or making effective the policy?

Mr. BYRNES. If the Senator believes that there are two sides to it, he evidently has good reason for making the statement.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am not passing on whether there are two sides or not.

Mr. BYRNES. I know the Senator from Kentucky is not in favor of the sit-down strike. Mr. William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, says he is not in favor of it; I know Mr. Sidney Hillman, the head of the textile workers, and a very capable leader, in this morning's paper is quoted as saying he did not want his statement construed as indicating that he was in favor of the sit-down strike. I do not think there are two sides. I do not know any man who says he is in favor of it. But no one wants to do anything about it, and no one wants to say anything about it. The Senator from Kentucky is not in favor of the sit-down strike, is he?

Mr. BARKLEY. I have said heretofore, and I repeat, that I think the sit-down strike is unlawful, and that those who engage in it are guilty of trespass, which is a violation of State law.

Mr. BYRNES. Then the amendment would declare as a policy just what the Senator says he believes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield further?

Mr. TYDINGS. A point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. TYDINGS. I understood the Senator from California to have the floor, and that he yielded to the Senator from South Carolina, but everybody else seems to be talking, and I cannot tell who has the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is well taken. The Senator from California has the floor.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator from California can take care of himself without much assistance from anyone else.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I was willing to yield to all Senators, and let everyone of them be heard in reference to this matter.

Now I desire to say a word, very quietly, in respect to the pending amendment. The amendment is a declaration of policy. I do not claim, because I do not know, whether it hits the particular matter it is designed to strike. I imagine it is designed to touch the sit-down strike, and I am ready to vote now or at any other time on the question of the policy of the Government in relation to the sit-down strike.

I think we do a great disservice to this Nation when in this body gentlemen debate the sit-down strike and say it is unlawful, but, but, but—and then begin to give fanciful reasons for its existence.

I yield to no man in adherence to union labor. I have 30 years behind me of effective dealing in behalf of union labor, and I expect to have many more years before I die in legislating in behalf of union labor. But I am opposed to the sit-down strike. I am opposed to the idea that any body of men can come into my house or to yours, can shut the door and lock it, and say that they will keep possession of our homes during the time while we are determining whether we will yield to some demands of theirs.

I am opposed to every single, solitary element of the sit-down strike. As a friend of union labor I am opposed to the sit-down strike.

I would be willing to vote, if this were a declaration of policy that would stand up, in favor of the amendment; but if there be doubt about it, I do not want it adopted. I do not want anything here to confuse the issue, and I do not want anything brought up that will enable those who believe in the sit-down strike to say that the Senate on a vote declared itself in favor of the sit-down strike.

I do not know whether the Senator from South Carolina has hit this thing or not. If he has, I am willing to go with him, and I will go down the line with him no matter how many Senators there be upon this floor who may excuse the sit-down strike in one way or another.

Now, on another topic. There is Federal law which deals with just such questions as this. There is a statute of the United States which makes it the imperative duty of the President of the United States to deal with this kind of a question. I read section 5299 of the Revised Statutes:

> Whenever insurrection, domestic violence, unlawful combinations, or conspiracies in any State so obstructs or hinders the execution of the laws thereof, and of the United States, as to deprive any portion or class of the people of such State of any of the rights, privileges, or immunities, or protection named in the Constitution and secured by the laws for the protection of such rights, privileges, or immunities, and the constituted authorities of such State are unable to protect, or, from any cause, fail in or refuse protection of the people in such rights, such facts shall be deemed a denial by such State of the equal protection of the laws to which they are entitled under the Constitution of the United States; and in all such cases, or whenever any such insurrection, violence, unlawful combination, or conspiracy, opposes or obstructs the laws of the United States or the due execution thereof, or impedes or obstructs the due course of justice under the same, it shall be lawful for the President, and it shall be his duty, to take such measures, by the employment of the militia or the land and naval forces of the United States, or of either, or by other means, as he may deem necessary, for the suppression of such insurrection, domestic violence, or combinations.

I have read this to show that there is a remedy.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator recognizes the fact that before the Federal Government can send troops into a State, the Governor of the State must indicate the necessity for it.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I recognize that fact. But that is one case, and this is another case.

Mr. ROBINSON. What is the other case?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. The other case I have just read. I have read it just now, and in the best voice that I have, and I thought I had made it plain.

> Whenever insurrection, domestic violence, unlawful combinations or conspiracies in any State so obstructs or hinders the execution of the laws thereof, and of the United States as to deprive any portion or class of the people of such State of any of their rights, privileges, or immunities, or protection, named in the Constitution and secured by the laws for the protection of such rights, privileges, and immunities—

Then the President may act, and it is made his duty to act.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have not examined it during this debate, but my recollection is that there is a provision that when there is insurrection, in case of the inability of the State to cope with the situation, if the legislature is in session, it may request the President by joint resolution to send troops into the State to quell the rebellion or the insurrection, but if the legislature is not in session, then the Governor must perform the function.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. The Senator is entirely correct. What he says is true. However, this is a different sort of case, and, if the Senator will pardon me, it has been construed only once that I know of, in an Ohio case in 1922, where the Ohio court held that the President was the sole judge of whether or not he should act under the section.

I am not going to take long in this discussion. I simply desire to appeal to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES]. If there is any question about his resolution, if there is any doubt about what it does, if there is some flaw in it in respect to the sit-down strike, let us make it plain, and then let gentlemen vote as they please upon it.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. The Senator stated at the outset of his remarks that it would be almost impossible to offer any resolution on this subject as to which some Senator would not have great doubt and, possibly, express some confusion of mind. But the amendment is as clear as can be. If there was ever any doubt about it applying to the home of an employee, that is eliminated by the proviso. It is simply the same declaration of policy that is contained in section 9 in behalf of labor as to collective bargaining, and as to a company union. The same language is used in that and other sections in behalf of labor as is used in this paragraph in the expression of a public policy against the sit-down strike.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, has the Senator from California concluded?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I was going to respond to the Senator from South Carolina. What I want is a clean-cut proposition about which there can be no mistake. Let us describe it as a sit-down strike. That I think is sufficient designation now, in view of the meaning of the word, to enable us to describe it in terms—a sit-down strike—and then we can have a vote upon it which will enable us to determine what shall be done.

A sit-down strike! Just think of it—a sit-down strike! Think of men coming up here, fifty or a hundred or a thousand, walking into this Chamber and sitting down here, and we will get out, and then we will say, "No; we will not even declare a policy regarding the fact that those men came within this Chamber and acted in that fashion."

For once and for all, let us make it plain that the Government of the United States, through the United States Senate, declares its policy in regard to a sit-down strike!

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, first and generally I want to associate myself completely with the observations just made by the Senator from California. Secondly, I want to say that this problem comes so intimately home to the State which I have the honor and responsibility in part to represent that I could not allow it to come to a conclusion without some discussion, and I am asking whether it is the intention and desire to proceed to a conclusion with respect to passage of the bill this evening.

Mr. NEELY. That is the desire of those who have charge of the bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, have we now arrived at the point where this is regarded as a resolution condemning the sit-down strike? Is that the understanding?

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I do not know to whom the Senator is directing his remarks.

Mr. BORAH. I am directing them to the author of the resolution. I asked the author of the resolution in the beginning if it was a condemnation of the sit-down strike. I did not understand the author to answer the question directly, but he said that the construction was whatever——

Mr. BYRNES. No; the Senator misunderstood me. In response to the question of the Senator from West Virginia, phrased as his question was, I said it means just what he said, but I stated in response to the Senator from Idaho that I agreed entirely with his statement that it was a condemnation of the sit-down strike.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, it does not make the slightest difference what interpretation is put upon this amendment by Senators who sit here this afternoon. The interpretation that will be put upon it in the Nation as a whole is precisely and specifically the one that the Senator from Idaho describes; and that is the vice of the situation if the amendment is defeated.

I am not prepared to say that the amendment is in the form it ought to be. I do not know that it ought to apply exclusively to coal miners. I gravely doubt whether it belongs in this bill. But I repeat that the vice of the situation is that if this proposal goes to a vote on the floor of the Senate and is defeated, the inevitable interpretation will be that the Senate has declined to condemn the sit-down strike. It makes no difference whether or not that interpretation is justified. That is the terrible feature of the situation in which we now find ourselves.

Unfortunately, Mr. President, there are many phases of the sit-down strikes that have been the subject of misrepresentation and misunderstanding. Unfortunately, the President of the United States himself is the victim of some of these misrepresentations and misunderstandings. Here, for instance, is the original literature through which membership in the Lewis unions is solicited in various parts of the country, circulated in an envelope which says—

A message to you from the President.

Mr. President, it does not say "from the President of the United States." It is very subtle; but there is no doubt in the world that that meaning is intended; and on the inside, at the top of the solicitation, it says:

The President wants you to join the union.

Perhaps he does; but, Mr. President, I do not believe that he for a moment would condone some of the practices which are involved in the thing we are discussing, and which are corollary to the invitation I have just submitted. That is only one of the many doubtful situations which have arisen.

When so reliable and so friendly a journalist as Mr. Arthur Krock, of the New York Times, writes what I am now about to read, I submit that unfortunately it does not make much difference whether it is true or not. The malignant effects result anyway. I read:

If the President has any doubt that his great prestige has been used in the contrary direction—

That being in the direction of condoning the sit-down strike—here is some testimony from Detroit, authenticated by three reliable witnesses. A union leader addressing the Statler Hotel strikers in Detroit on Monday afternoon, March 15, said in effect:

"You have nothing to fear from the police or from the courts. The President and the Governor of Michigan are back of you. The food here is yours. Any room you wish to occupy is yours. The bar belongs to you. The President wants you to have the good things of life. He supports the poor of this country in taking what belongs to them."

This is a single instance.

Continues Mr. Krock—

The President can hardly be held responsible for such mouthings.

And I most emphatically agree that that is so. I repeat, he is the victim of this thing.

But his silence has encouraged the belief, since he has not failed to take note of other national situations which have had elements of public peril.

This is just one more of those situations which is going to be misconstrued and misinterpreted, no matter what happens. I deeply regret that it arises in this inconclusive form. The Senate cannot afford to have it said by anyone, however misguided and unjustified the statement may be, that it has condoned sit-down strikes or anything connected with them.

Mr. President, one of the reasons why we in the Senate find ourselves in trouble at the moment in connection with this problem is the fact that the governmental agencies dealing with labor relationships have been so completely silent respecting the sit-down strike. They are very vocal indeed, respecting the obligations of the employer, but as silent as the tomb respecting obligations to law and order and the maintenance of civilized society. "Silence gives consent", and that is the trouble; there has been nothing but silence—or worse.

There has not been any silence in Canada. We had the honor this afternoon of entertaining the Governor General of Canada. The Canadian Government, on March 25, speaking through the Minister of Justice officially, made this statement:

Sit-down strikes are calculated to undermine respect for law and order and to create disorder and riots against which organized labor in Canada has always stood firmly. The Canadian Government is prepared to utilize all the agencies at its command to restrain or prevent such illegal methods.

Mr. President, it is my conviction that all in the world this situation needs is a similar firm announcement on behalf of the high spokesmanship of the Government of the United States, and this trouble will largely terminate. But continued silence in the high spokesmanship inevitably, I repeat, will continue to be misunderstood.

Mr. President, the welfare of labor is wrapped up in the matter I am discussing. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is absolutely right when he says there are many other factors in the labor equation which ought to be surveyed and disciplined in connection with the determination of this issue. I agree to that. I most emphatically agree that those benighted employers who still insist upon dealing with labor as a commodity are not only hurting themselves, but are utterly out of step with any possibility of an enlightened, progressive society in the United States. I am prepared to join in any and every liberal thought and purpose and formula that can encourage the larger participation of labor in the fruits of its own production. But, Mr. President, what good does it do labor to gain these advantages if it destroys the orderly society in which to enjoy them?

That is not the only menace to labor in the situation which we confront in connection with sit-down strikes. There is another very grave menace which I think labor leaders should recognize. I believe that even the responsible leaders of that section of labor which has been related to sit-down strikes realize it. I refer to the fact that the moment this formula of violence is turned loose in a community, I care not how nobly meditated the purpose may be and I care not how carefully the labor leaders may seek to confine it within reasonable and appropriate limits from their point of view, the desperate result is that it immediately becomes the subject of every subversive force in that community, and all the lawlessness, all the hoodlumism, all the syndicalism, and all the communism there is in the area rushes for the point to pour oil on the conflagration.

Is there any doubt about this? Let us look at the Detroit situation for just a moment. I am saying that the menace of the sit-down strike is a menace even to legitimate labor as such. It is infinitely more of a menace to those who take advantage of the invitation and the opportunity to practice a violence which otherwise they would not dare undertake.

The Associated Press, in a dispatch from Detroit, said:

Law-enforcement officers detained more than a dozen men Friday in a drive to wipe out strong-arm methods and what Governor Murphy termed "modified banditry"—

That is Governor Murphy's phrase, and certainly Governor Murphy is not hostile to the best interests of labor—

"modified banditry" in labor disputes here.

Police Inspector George Hertel announced that one former Purple gangster, a relative of another Purple gangster, and a known "hoodlum" were helping manage a sit-down strike at the Newton Packing Co. plant.

At the same time Police Inspector John A. Hoffman said that one of the ringleaders in the Frank & Seder department store strike is a former convict, sentenced for conspiracy to kidnap, and that another had a police record.

I could continue for an hour to present similar exhibits.

Mr. President, make no mistake about what I am saying. Union labor has utterly nothing to do with the exhibits I am presenting. They condemn, precisely as I do, the thing about which I am talking. Indeed, I wish to say that I am reliably informed that there were only two arrests made in connection with that dreaded mass meeting in Detroit 1 week ago where 60,000 people assembled, and those were arrests of Communists who were arrested at the direction of labor-union leadership itself. I want to make it plain that, so far as labor-union leadership is concerned, it feels precisely as I do, that the hitch-hiking forces which attach themselves to the sit-down-strike movements are desperately dangerous.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes.

Mr. KING. When the Senator mentioned union labor, did he refer to John Lewis or to William Green? I know that Mr. Green has condemned in the most aggressive way the sit-down strikes, but I have not heard any condemnation from Mr. Lewis or his collaborators.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think, if I heard the Senator from South Carolina correctly, that he quoted Mr. Sidney Hillman on the subject.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I stated that Mr. Hillman was quoted in the newspapers this morning as stating that he did not intend that he should be quoted as favoring sit-down strikes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Now, Mr. President, I desire to read to the Senate one exhibit from a source which I am sure it will sympathetically hear. The Senate still remembers the name "Couzens", and it still remembers it respectfully and with confidence. I read a letter addressed to me by Mayor Frank Couzens, of the city of Detroit. It is dated March 29:

As you know, for the past several weeks Detroit has been unsettled by an epidemic of sit-down strikes. In many instances these strikes have been called against the wishes of the majority of employees in the affected establishments. Frequently, agitators, not even employed, aided in the seizure of the stores or factories, and on some occasions forced the owners out of their buildings and made them surrender keys. Court orders have been ignored and defied. Thousands of Detroit citizens, desiring to continue work, have been deprived of livelihood, and many millions of dollars in wages have been lost. The general public is deeply affected by the situation, and all reputable citizens desire that labor receive an adequate wage and enjoy happy and proper working conditions. But, in my opinion, they do not approve of the manner in which most of these sit-down strikes have been called.

I shall not discuss the General Motors' or Chrysler's sit-down strikes as I had no part in the handling of them.

This letter emphasizes what I am saying—that this problem rises to its major menace, not within union labor, but on the outside of it, among those who rush to the opportunity to enjoy the privilege of violence when they would not dare do it upon their own responsibility.

I continue reading Mayor Couzens' letter, and I ask Senators to listen to this episode:

May I tell you of an occurrence which happened in Detroit when approximately 60 individuals actually raided the Frank & Seder store and called a sit-down strike. They demanded that everyone stop work. I have reports that women fainted; that when they tried to rush from the building, actual force was used in an attempt to keep them from doing so. At that particular time I was attending a meeting with the Governor of the State of Michigan and Frank X. Martel, reputed leader of the Detroit and Wayne County Federation of Labor. I left the meeting and sent several hundred police officers to the Frank & Seder store, where we technically held everyone until testimony, affidavits, etc., could be secured. I remained at the store for hours and listened to testimony. I did not find one single employee—at that store who testified he wanted to strike. Most of the employees took exception to the manner in which this sit-down strike was called.

One single employee—

Detroit's condition is not an exception. They are having just such difficulties in New York, Chicago, and other large cities, and I believe it is a condition in which the Federal Government should and must take a hand. I do not wish to imply that the State and city governments are unable to cope with the situation, but I sincerely believe that the time has come when all agencies of government should join in an intelligent effort to restore industrial peace. I believe that a great deal could be accomplished toward this end—

And I emphasize this sentence, Mr. President; I should like everybody to hear it—

I believe that a great deal could be accomplished toward this end—

Says Mayor Couzens—

if you were to request and urge the President and Congress to use their efforts to terminate sit-down strikes and to bring about proper methods of settling such labor disputes.

Mr. President, in the face of such conditions in my own State, I do not propose to confront, without a considerable discussion of what is involved, an amendment which, if adopted, will be interpreted as condemning sit-down strikes, or which, if defeated, will be interpreted as registering the Senate's approval for sit-down strikes.

I agree with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] that there is a very limited Federal jurisdiction that can be applied, although the able Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] has indicated the existence of a statute under which there is a direct and specific Presidential responsibility. What I am saying is that there is a moral responsibility which thus far has not been exercised or declared, and it is a responsibility which not only rests on this Chamber but goes straight down Pennsylvania Avenue to the White House. There is an opportunity for the effective, persuasive spokesmanship of this land to do labor, above all others, a tremendous service at this moment, and to do a tremendous service as well to organized society and to the cause of law and order and decency, by speaking out upon the fundamentals, guaranteeing labor that a chastened society will see to it that an appropriate formula is provided to do industrial justice and to guarantee industrial fair play, but, on the other hand, to make it plain that there is no spot or place under the American flag where illegal trespass, lawlessness, or violence can be brought successfully and safely into play without challenging every organized force that a government worthy to exist will bring to bear upon the situation.

ACCOUNTING SYSTEM OF TREASURY

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, it is manifest that this debate cannot be concluded within reasonable limits this evening. Therefore, it is my intention to move a recess until noon tomorrow. It had been hoped that we might conclude the consideration of the bill today and take an adjournment until Monday, but that does not now seem practicable to me and to others with whom I have had the opportunity of conferring.

I wish, however, to make a statement before moving an executive session.

An article appearing in the Washington Herald on Wednesday morning contained the statement that a witness before an executive session of the Joint Committee on Government Reorganization testified in substance that "the poorest and worst organized of all the departments of the Government with respect to accounting is the Treasury."

I merely desire to say that no such testimony was given to the joint committee. A witness appearing before the committee did make the statement that the accounting system of the Treasury was scattered and decentralized, and that from the point of view of centralization it was a poor set-up. The witness further said that in order to reorganize the accounting system in order to obtain a centralized system, statutory provisions would have to be enacted to permit the Treasury to make any substantial correction in their present set-up. In other words, decentralization and scattered accounting organization are among the principal faults of the existing law. There was no statement or admission by the witness that the decentralized systems themselves failed to perform the purposes for which they were established.

There were other statements in the same article that are not supported by the testimony, but I do not care to take notice of them at this time.

Mr. President, if there is no other business to be transacted, I shall move an executive session.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair may state to the Senator that there is no Executive Calendar; and if there is any report of a committee to be submitted for the Executive Calendar, it can be offered now out of order.

RECESS

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, in all probability it will be necessary to have an executive session tomorrow. I now move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Friday, April 2, 1937, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, APRIL 1, 1937

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we thank Thee for the transcendent riches of the divine heart. In the tenderness of Thy strength manifest Thyself in our purposes and achievements. We praise Thee for the rewards of the faithful. Thou wilt give them the morning star, the symbol of calmness and long perspective. Open our eyes to large views; and with a high sense of our responsibility and with dignity of character may we walk the pathway of life. Merciful God, come to this scarred, torn, modern world with ministries of wisdom and knowledge; impress it with the tragedies which corrode and corrupt the common order of humanity. Do Thou break down the tyranny of selfishness, which is the secret of its fatal woes, and enthrone in its very soul the power of Christian brotherhood. Strip away all hypocritical pretenses, all godless ambitions and falsehood, and let there be an inbreak of the Almighty One into the souls of all lands. Remember us, O Lord, with the favor that Thou bearest unto Thy people.

Bless the Lord, all His works in all places of His dominion: bless the Lord.

In our Savior's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MEAD and Mr. LAMNECK asked and were given permission to extend their own remarks in the RECORD.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that leave of absence for today be granted my colleague the gentleman from California, Mr. HAVENNER, who is absent attending the funeral of a relative.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

MALINDA J. MAST AND WILLIAM LEE MAST

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 1245) for the relief of Malinda J. Mast and William Lee Mast, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The House bill, I may say, Mr. Speaker, provides payment of the claim "out of money not otherwise appropriated." The bill has been amended by the Senate to read that the money shall be paid out of funds allocated by the President for the maintenance and operation of the Civilian Conservation Corps.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Page 1, line 5, strike out "not otherwise appropriated" and insert "allocated by the President for the maintenance and operation of the Civilian Conservation Corps."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL, 1938

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. NICHOLS. May I inquire of the Chair whether or not all points of order have been reserved on the bill H. R. 5996, the District of Columbia appropriation bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair may state the RECORD shows the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] reserved all points of order on the bill.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5996) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and for other purposes; and pending that motion, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate may continue throughout the day, the time to be equally divided between and controlled by myself and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ENGEL].

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman a question? I understand it is not the intention to start reading the bill for amendment today?

Mr. COLLINS. That is correct.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 5996, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, with Mr. COOPER in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I have no requests for time at the moment, and I will therefore ask the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ENGEL] to yield some of his time.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. PLUMLEY].

THE WAR DEBTS

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Chairman, yesterday my friend, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HARLAN], in discussing the subject of war debts made the following observation. He said, in substance, that if they, meaning the debtor nations, have any intention of paying these debts at any time, if we can make it possible for them to do so without a serious drain upon themselves, I submit that there is no legitimate excuse that can be advanced at this time. Then later he said, in substance, that if there is any intention on the part of these foreign countries to do anything but welsh on their debts after we have cut their debts in half by reducing their interest rates and their amortization charges, after we have again reduced them almost another half by devaluing our gold coin, if they do not show intention to comply with as reasonable a proposition as this, it seems to me that the deductions are obvious. Meaning, I take it, that our debtors have no intention of paying. One of the troubles with this war debt subject is exactly that which Mark Twain said was involved with respect to New England weather, namely, "Everybody talks about it and nobody does anything about it."

WE ARE "HOLDING THE BAG"

In my judgment there never was a more propitious, diplomatically strategic opportunity afforded anybody than we have this very minute—right now, as they say on the street—to make some people "put up or shut up", and relieve us, the people of the United States, from "holding the bag" any longer.

FOREIGN DIPLOMATIC ACES HERE

Mr. Chairman, "with war threatening, Europe sends her ace diplomats to Washington", so says Constantine Brown. It is true. Washington is once more one of the most important diplomatic centers of the world. Fearing a collapse of the fragile, nonsubstantial, and overburdened peace structure, European nations are preparing for war with breakneck speed. Some of them—Britain, France, and others—have the audacity to hope that in the event of a conflagration which involves them, as it must, they will again be able to induce us to join in the brawl. Vain hope! The leading countries of Europe are sending here to Washington their ablest, shrewdest diplomats.

France is sending Georges Bonnet, a member of Parliament and one of their keenest brains, and the rumor is current that his stay will be temporary, and that he will be succeeded by Francois-Poncet, present Ambassador to Berlin, acknowledged ace of France's diplomacy. Dr. Hans Luther, easy-going and kind, as well as able, has gone back to Berlin, to be succeeded here by the Under Secretary of State, Ambassador Hans Dieckhoff, the ablest man in the German diplomatic service.

Britain, while it extended the tenure of the able Sir Ronald Lindsay has, according to rumor, selected and designated that brilliant, dynamic Englishman, ace of England's diplomatic corps, Sir Robert Vansittart, its present Under Secretary of State, to succeed him.

Italy, so it is rumored in Rome, is about to replace Mussolini's right-hand man in his Foreign Office, the Italian Ambassador Fulvio Suvich, with Count Vitetti, formerly counselor of the Embassy here in Washington, the husband of an American wife, and an outstanding representatives of the country he serves.

England, France, Germany, Italy, and others are sending the best they have, and they are coming here to do business; and they know their business.

Do not be misled by the notion that the inevitable war in Europe is so imminent and ominous as to necessitate their present coming; but understand this, they are here for the purpose of preparing for that inevitable day when war shall come.

Just ordinary common sense, it seems to me, suggests that they are concerned about the preservation and continuance of their governmental and individual existence. These are the ends they serve. Another thing which we do well not to forget is the fact that all the war debtor nations remember, if we do not, that in April 1917 the United States entered the World War in their behalf.

WHAT IT COST IN MONEY AND MEN

Twenty years ago next Tuesday, April 6, 1917, the United States entered the World War. That was a fateful day for America; none the less so have been all the days which have followed.

In retrospection we do not understand any better now than we did as of those days and times how the American people were able to and did accomplish so many of the seemingly impossible things they did. Some of them were and still are almost miraculous.

Did you ever stop and realize that for the period of 25 months from that day in April 1917, through another April, and that of 1919, the war cost the people of the United States considerably more than $1,000,000 an hour; that the Treasury disbursements during that period reached a total of $23,500,000,000, of which only $1,650,000,000 may be properly charged to normal expenses which would have occurred in time of peace? The balance may rightly be counted as the direct money cost of the war to the end of April 1919, and it amounts to the staggering sum of $21,850,000,000.

This amount is 20 times our pre-war national debt. In addition to this huge expenditure we advanced loans to the Allies at the rate of nearly half a million dollars an hour. For this purpose Congress authorized $10,000,000,000. So much for money; now for men.

What an outpouring of America was involved. At the time of the armistice there were over 2,000,000 American soldiers in France.

Arrays of figures and statistics—

Says Maj. Gen. James G. Harbord, commander of the Services of Supply, in his final report, submitted in May 1919—may frighten the general reader; they certainly do not attract him. Yet who can tell without a few figures the story of this part of the world's greatest military adventure, in which a nation engaged in war across seas 3,500 miles from its own shores, transported its soldiers by the millions, its material resources in millions of tons, and counted the cost in billions of dollars. Nothing on such a scale had been seen in war since Xerxes crossed the world of his time in the attempt to overwhelm Greece. No such difficulties had been encountered in war since Xenophon and the Ten Thousand reached the sea at Trebizond or Alexander crossed the mountain passes into India. The only considerable war waged overseas in modern times was that in South Africa, for which the British transported by sea something like 300,000 men.

We do not have to be reminded that in this organization and transportation of our troops was involved and—

Accomplished the greatest homegoing in human history. It was the greatest round trip that mankind has ever undertaken. During the 19 months of our participation in the World War more than 2,000,000 American soldiers went to France. Half a million in the first 13 months; a million and a half in the last 6 months. The greatest number arriving in France in any one month was 306,350 men in July 1918. In May of the following year 333,333 men sailed for America, homeward bound. Between the armistice and the end of August 1919, 8½ months, the boys went home.

Not all of them, for despite the fact that American troops were on the ground only during the last 6 months, and it is true American losses were trifling as compared with the staggering casualties of the Allies, nevertheless American losses were:

Killed in battle	48,909
Wounded	237,135
Missing	2,913
Taken prisoner	4,434
	293,391

While it is true that—

No reputable author will make the flat statement that "America won the World War." Any writer of repute, however, not writing for political purposes must, in writing history, record the fact that it was only because of the increasing flood of American military manpower, and the quality of our armies that the Central Powers were defeated in 1918.

Subsequent events have convinced many of us that we were right, and that General Pershing should have been consulted and his advice taken with respect to the terms of the armistice, and his advice which he offered for the consideration of the supreme war council should have been followed when he said:

Finally, I believe the complete victory can only be obtained by continuing the war until we force unconditional surrender from Germany, but if the Allied Governments decide to grant an armistice the terms should be so rigid that under no circumstances could Germany again take up arms.

Moreover, our position with respect to this matter is confirmed by the knowledge which we now have that the same views were entertained by Marshal Foch.

With respect to the signing of the armistice, General Harbord makes this pertinent and interesting comment:

It was 6 o'clock on the morning of November 11, 1918, in Washington when the armistice signed in the wagon-lit of Marshal Foch took effect on the western front. The announcement was made to the American people by President Wilson as soon as the news reached the White House:

"MY FELLOW COUNTRYMEN: The armistice was signed this morning. Everything for which America fought has been accomplished. It will now be our fortunate duty to assist by example, by sober, friendly counsel, and by material aid in the establishment of just democracy throughout the world."

A slightly different estimate of our fortunate duty appeared in an advertisement in the metropolitan press next day—trust the American advertising man:

"Now that liberty has triumphed, now that the forces of right have begun their reconstruction of humanity's morals, the world faces a material task of equal magnitude."

That expressed willingness to look after the morals of the rest of the world was to be pretty nearly the key to American foreign policy for 20 years to come.

Twenty years. And those nations which owe their continued political and individual existence to the United States still fail to repay the loans we made them and apparently are disinclined to recognize their obligations to us as measured in dollars and cents.

THE WAR DEBTS

The war debts. Will they ever be paid? This has been an ever-recurring and unanswered question for a sixth of a century. What is the answer? Is the possibility of repayment growing less and less with the passing years? Between May 1, 1923, and May 3, 1926, certain debt-funding agreements were signed with the various debtor nations, based on what was then termed "capacity to pay", under which agreements the debt over the period of repayment would amount to approximately twenty-two billions, as indicated in table 1.

TABLE 1

	Debt prior to funding agreement, including interest at original rate	Debt as funded	Total to be received over funding period, principal and interest
Belgium	$483,426,000	$417,780,000	$727,830,500
Czechoslovakia	123,854,000	115,000,000	312,811,433
Estonia	14,143,000	13,830,000	37,707,645
Finland	9,190,000	9,000,000	21,695,055
France	4,230,777,000	4,025,000,000	6,847,674,104
Great Britain	4,715,310,000	4,600,000,000	11,105,965,000
Hungary	1,984,000	1,939,000	4,754,431
Italy	2,150,150,000	2,042,000,000	2,407,677,500
Latvia	5,893,000	5,775,000	15,790,523
Lithuania	6,216,000	6,030,000	15,069,541
Poland	182,324,000	178,560,000	481,674,781
Rumania	46,945,000	44,950,000	122,506,260
Yugoslavia	66,164,000	62,850,000	95,177,635
	12,036,376,000	11,522,354,000	22,196,334,408

As is suggested by John C. LeClair, who made up the foregoing and the following tables, an analysis indicates—

That the total sum expected over the period of repayment was, in the case of several of the powers, several times the original amount. The impossibility of repayment, in terms of what has actually transpired, can be observed from the figures in table 2, where for purposes of comparison the total amount to be paid over the 62-year period is again set up. In adjacent columns are listed the actual amounts received by this Government since the beginning of the payments along with the total sums unpaid to date.

TABLE 2

	Total to be received over funding period, principal and interest	Total payments received as of Dec. 1, 1936	Total due and unpaid as of Dec. 1, 1936
Belgium	$727,830,500	$52,191,273	$42,772,722
Czechoslovakia	312,811,433	20,134,092	11,266,961
Estonia	37,707,645	1,248,432	2,934,736
Finland	21,695,055	4,310,117
France	6,847,674,104	486,075,891	325,080,017
Great Britain	11,105,965,000	2,024,848,817	668,674,071
Hungary	4,754,431	468,466	327,791
Italy	2,407,677,500	100,829,890	63,494,976
Latvia	15,790,523	761,549	1,096,878
Lithuania	15,069,541	1,237,956	942,760
Poland	481,674,781	22,646,297	36,575,027
Rumania	122,506,260	4,791,007	5,492,500
Yugoslavia	95,177,635	2,588,771	1,500,000
	22,196,334,408	2,722,132,548	1,160,158,439

It appears that less than three billions has been paid against the twenty-two billion eventually to be collected according to expectations. The default this last year has been more than a billion.

PAYMENT POSTPONED

June 20, 1931, the American Government proposed—the postponement during 1 year of all payments on intergovernmental debts, reparations, and relief debts, both principal and interest, of course, not including obligations of governments held by private parties. Subject to confirmation by Congress, the American Government will postpone all payments upon the debts of foreign governments to the American Government payable during the fiscal year beginning July 1 next, conditional on a like postponement for 1 year of all payments on intergovernmental debts owing the important creditor powers.

In his proposal for the moratorium, President Hoover said:

Authority of the President to deal with this problem is limited, as this action must be supported by the Congress. It has been assured the cordial support of leading members of both parties in the Senate and the House. The essence of this proposition is to give time to permit debtor governments to recover their national prosperity. I am suggesting to the American people that they be wise creditors in their own interest and be good neighbors.

I wish to take this occasion also to frankly state my views upon our relations to German reparations and the debts owed to us by the allied governments of Europe. Our Government has not been a party to, or exerted any voice in determination of, reparation obligations. We purposely did not participate in either general reparations or the division of colonies or property. The repayment of debts due to us from the Allies for the advances for war and reconstruction was settled upon a basis not contingent upon German reparations or related thereto. Therefore, reparations are necessarily wholly a European problem with which we have no relation.

I do not approve in any remote sense of the cancelation of the debts to us. World confidence would not be enhanced by such action. None of our debtor nations has ever suggested it. But as the basis of the settlement of these debts was the capacity under normal conditions of the debtor to pay, we should be consistent with our own policies and principles if we take into account the abnormal situation now existing in the world. I am sure the American people have no desire to attempt to extract any sum beyond the capacity of any debtor to pay, and it is our view that broad vision requires that our Government should recognize the situation as it exists.

OUR WAR-DEBT POLICY

In 1931, our war-debt policy was stated in the joint resolution of Congress formally approving the Hoover moratorium.

SEC. 5. It is hereby expressly declared to be against the policy of Congress that any of the indebtedness of foreign countries to the United States should be in any manner canceled or reduced; and nothing in this joint resolution shall be construed as indicating a contrary policy, or as implying that favorable consideration will be given at any time to a change in the policy hereby declared.

Are then the war debts dead "like the soldiers who perished in the struggle because what they represented was destroyed at the same time and in the same fashion", as is argued by some? Is it true that President Roosevelt is satisfied that the debts cannot be collected?

In this connection it is interesting to note that the 1932 national platform of the Democratic Party is the statement:

We oppose cancelation of the debts owing to the United States by foreign nations.

The Republican national platform of 1936 announces:

We shall use every effort to collect the war debt due us from the foreign countries.

The people, therefore, it appears, are opposed to cancelation; from which it follows obviously that they are for the collection of the debts.

What are the American people to understand was meant by Neville Chamberlain, then Chancelor of the British Exchequer, when he said back in '32 or '33 that Britain—

Would not pay again and would reject all proposals for swapping or trading.

According to Dorsey Richardson—

Great Britain says that her own war debtors are not going to pay her, and that she loaned much more to her allies than she borrowed from us during the war. We answer that Great Britain got much more out of the war than we did. She had a more vital stake and she came out with German colonies, oil fields, mines. If she made bad loans, that is her misfortune.

These British arguments, and our replies, have nothing to do with the case. Great Britain has made her decision for her own best interest and we must decide what we are going to do about it from the same viewpoint—enlightened self-interest—not sentiment, not fair play, not friendship.

With respect to France, its policy and its obligations to the contributing causes, he says:

The essential fact is that the French people do not feel that they are obligated to pay the war debts since reparations have ceased.

In connection with our consideration of the attitude of France with respect to its payment of its debt to us we may well recall the fact that as John W. Thomas, Jr., says in a recent book reviewed:

The French assistance Franklin secured was decisive in the American Revolution. We may forget this—France never will.

It is also to be remembered, however, by France that the United States paid every red cent of the French loans; we never quibbled, defaulted, or resorted to "token payments", but paid in full and with interest.

Is it a fact that practically each and all and every one of our European war debtors has finally repudiated their wartime obligations to us? It is.

ARE THE WAR DEBTS DEAD?

Is it a fact that the war debts are as dead as Fenian bonds or Confederate securities, as Frank H. Simonds asserts? Is there no way under the sun to get back what we loaned except by going to war? As he suggests, this is precisely the way in which the debts were first made, which way will not quite obviate American necessity to spend something of its own as the national debts of our debtors show? Is this the only way?

Some say they could pay if they wanted to. To this statement an answer is made by others to the effect that the United States in attempting to arrive at a settlement found itself rigidly limited in its capacity to receive payment by the extent to which it was able and willing to restrict its own business at home or abroad.

The story is told of a song which found favor in a New England village, a song which narrated the adventures of a swain who, having taken the lady of his choice on a sleigh ride, was suddenly confronted by a crisis produced by a runaway. In the words of the song—

He had to let go something,
So he let go the horse.

Uncle Sam, it is alleged, was in the identical fix in the matter of the war debts. He, too, "had to let go something"; in his case, either his debts or his trade. Instead, with one hand he embraced the lady and with the other he clung to the reins. But from such a compromise only double disaster could result.

WERE WE EVER WILLING TO BE PAID?

Others ask if we were ever really willing to be paid. Frank Simonds says:

It was natural and human for the American people to want to enjoy the best of two worlds—the old, which they had lived in before the war; and the new, which they had just entered—to have a comfortable export surplus, an adequate merchant marine, and a handsome income from war debts into the bargain. But the thing just couldn't be done. The country had to adopt the principles of the Manchester school or go back to the rules of McKinley. A creditor nation must run its business one way; a debtor another. The former has to adapt itself to accepting payments in goods and services; the latter can export to its heart's content, as long as it can borrow enough to keep its export surplus going.

Uncle Sam was, then, in the situation of the voter in the polling booth—he had to choose between two tickets; but if he attempted to vote for both, he would merely spoil his ballot. Nevertheless, that was precisely what Uncle Sam did do. And that was why a Republican regime which came into power to the beguiling strains of "Yes; we have no bananas" went out to the appropriate tune of "Brother, can you spare a dime?" And the newly installed Democratic regime will fare no better if it also insists upon collecting debts while refusing payments in the only form in which they can be made.

TRADE TREATIES SCRAPPED WHEN WAR COMES

"Can we trade them in for trade?" asks someone. Surely, I do not know. I do know that with a full panoplied war in progress in Europe all these trade agreements of ours put together will not be worth the scraps of paper on which they are written. Think that over.

Mr. Chairman, if there is nothing we can do about it—and I do not believe that is so—why not tell the people so; why not do something to close the books as a matter of record? If we must stultify ourselves by accepting the repudiation as accomplished by them, let us get it over and behind us. Let us put a stop, someway, somehow, to any further extension of our dilly-dallying policy and dawdling program of doing nothing.

WE CANNOT AFFORD TO FIGHT TO COMPEL PAYMENT

If these debtors of ours cannot pay, which I do not believe is true, or will not pay, which is more likely to be the situation, and we must fight them in order to get our money back, then everybody knows it is, of course, not worth the candle. It would cost us more in lives and men and treasure to enforce our demands than all the countries of the Old World put together and all their debts to us and all their treasures are worth. That may be what they think. That may be just the line on which they are proceeding. Now, right now, is a good time to find out; and then to act accordingly.

WAR DEBTS AND WORLD PROSPERITY

A book was published in 1932 for the Brookings Institute of Economics which was in a sense a synthesis and an analysis of a 10-year searching and nonpartisan investigation of the issues involved in the problem of reparations and other intergovernmental debt obligations resulting from the World War. The book was entitled "War Debts and World Prosperity", and its authors were Harold G. Moulton and Leo Pasvolsky. In the directors' preface appears this statement:

It is hoped that the analysis contained in this book will help to clarify the intricate and confused issues involved. Such understanding is of special importance at the present time when the war debts have again been brought to the forefront of public attention in every important country of the world and when far-reaching negotiations for a final solution of this tragic problem are in progress.

WAR-DEBT CONFERENCE LONG OVERDUE

This is interesting for there are grounds for thinking that another period in the discussion of war debts due the United States is rapidly approaching. We know that official statesmen from Great Britain have visited us, and although they have stated that their visits had nothing to do with the war-debt settlement, we have reason to suspect at least, that the subject is being given serious consideration here, and that we are in communication with England and France with respect to the same, and that further conferences are desired.

NO DISPOSITION AND NO ATTEMPT TO PAY

There is one thing about this situation which is realized and comprehended by the man on the street, namely: That if an arrangement is made which is impractical and cannot be carried out, there will be no disposition, and no attempt to pay. He also entertains the opinion that there will be some countries which under any arrangement which can be made will be disposed to elude, if not to repudiate, their obligations. He does not know how much our debtor countries could or can pay, but he is of the opinion that the war debts should be settled. He does not care so much what the terms are so long as they can be met. On the other hand, you will find that there are very few Americans who are in favor of the cancelation of these debts.

H. Parker Willis, in a recent discussion entitled "Settling the Debts", has this to say:

As to whether there is a possibility of devising some plan of adjustment or cancelation that would be satisfactory to the American people and sufficiently satisfactory to the debtor nations to make the scheme acceptable, any opinion would be founded only upon conjecture, and as such, of little value. As Mr. LeClair expresses it, "Any plan by which payment of the war debts is to be obtained must be predicated on the good will of the debtor countries and their willingness to meet their obligations." This is, undoubtedly, the truth of the matter.

The question is, Will they pay?

From the book by Moulton and Pasvolsky, to which I have previously referred, and which was published by the Institute of Economics of the Brookings Institution, I quote as follows:

The coming of the world-wide economic depression has caused the war-debt problem to emerge more than ever as a dominating factor in the whole international scene. Whatever one's theories as to the depression as a whole, there is an indubitable relation between its causes and the war-debt problem, and an even closer relationship between the process of recovery from its disastrous effects and the continued existence of a vast body of intergovernmental obligations.

The basic economic implications of the war-debt problem are clear. The attempts to collect obligations, resulting not from productive economic developments but from the destructive processes of the war, have only served to impede the restoration of international economic equilibrium and world prosperity. While the obliteration of the war debts would not solve all the manifold difficulties under which the world is laboring, economic analysis leads unmistakably to the conclusion that the restoration and maintenance of world prosperity will be rendered much easier if the disorganizing effects of the war-debt payments are eliminated once and for all.

In view of the fact that we declined to prolong the Hoover moratorium and refused to cancel the war debts, as a consequence of which France and Belgium defaulted, Great Britain and Italy paid one more semiannual installment and then resorted to token payments; and then Congress passed and the President signed the Johnson bill putting countries which had defaulted outright and those making "token payment" on the same basis and Britain and Italy followed France and Belgium and defaulted—in view of the foregoing situation, is it true, as alleged, that there and thereby the tragicomedy of "collecting" the war debt had its final curtain?

THE JOHNSON DEBT DEFAULT ACT

To those who criticise Congress for the passage of the so-called Johnson or Debt Default Act of 1934, under the terms of which the foreign nations that have defaulted their payments on obligations due the United States Government cannot float any additional loans in this country, may I suggest that it is quite possible that this single act is accomplishing as much, if not more, to preserve the peace of the world than all the League of Nations has ever done. You know as well as I do, and nobody knows it any better than the European powers whose ace representatives and diplomats are now here in Washington, that none of them can carry on a major war, or over a considerable period of time, without American supplies; and what is more to the point just now, the purchase of such supplies would have to be financed by loans negotiated in these good old United States. Yes; now is just the time to act to find out what these diplomats are here to try to do, although it is as plain to me as the nose on your face.

DOES THE COST OF COLLECTING EQUAL THE PRICE OF CANCELATION?

Is it true that economically speaking the cost of collecting the debts would equal the price of cancelation, since to be paid the United States must accept goods and services to the value of the debt installments, which means, it is asserted, "letting American workmen stand idle while foreign laborers perform their tasks?"

Where then do our trade treaties come in?

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLUMLEY. I will yield for a question.

Mr. GIFFORD. Despite the fact these nations cannot borrow more money under the Johnson Act, have they not shown great ingenuity in the manipulation of the reciprocal-trade agreements?

Mr. PLUMLEY. They certainly have; and I do not think the reciprocal-trade agreements would be worth the paper on which they are written if we were involved in war.

Mr. Chairman, incidentally if you have wondered why Finland goes on paying us her war debt while her larger and wealthier neighbors default, let me answer your questions by saying it is because the people are Finns. It is no economic marvel; the reputation and the character of this people substantiate their bone-and-marrow honesty, their plain and simple integrity, which have made the name of Finland echo like "the clink of a true coin", and are both demonstrated by their undying and unimpeachable loyalty to their honor, their obligations, and their given word.

Great Britain, France, Italy, Belgium, Czechoslovakia, Estonia, Hungary, Latvia, Lithuania, Poland, and Rumania have defaulted. Commenting upon this default the Christian Century in an editorial once said:

CANNOT BE SETTLED BY REPUDIATION

All of which cannot but inspire in the private debtor the fervent wish that he might waive aside his own obligations with equal suavity. The other debtor nations simplified their procedure still further. They said nothing about it. Their technique was simply that of those who throw inconvenient bills in the waste-paper basket. All this is not to express an opinion as to whether the debts might not better be canceled, or whether payment might not do us more harm than good, or whether we ought not to admit that it was our war from the start, and that we ought not only to cancel debts but to pay the Allies for fighting for us before we got into it. Maybe so, maybe not. It is only to say that the debts are not settled until they are settled either by payment or by cancelation or by agreement—and that they cannot be settled by repudiation.

THE AMERICAN PEOPLE DEMAND THE FACTS

What the American people demand, Mr. Chairman, and that to which they are entitled, is an answer, definite, positive, and final to the everlasting, always recurring questions:

First. Will the war debts be paid by the debtor countries?

Second. Can we collect them?

Third. Shall we have to cancel them, charge them off, and assume the burden ourselves?

Is there a grain of comfort and common sense for us in an editorial appearing in the Saturday Evening Post on January 16 last, from which I quote:

From the first day that propaganda for cancelation of the war debts began, the Saturday Evening Post insisted that the Allied nations fulfill the terms of the bargains that they had made with us. At the same time, and repeatedly, we warned our readers against the huge private loans, especially those to Germany, that our bankers were floating all over Europe and the Americas.

For several years past we have refrained from mentioning the war debts or urging a settlement, and we are not disposed to ask for payment at the present time. From the stories that have been appearing in the press lately, it can be taken for granted that any sums offered in full satisfaction of our loans will be inadequate and represent only a minor part of those agreed on in the postwar discussions. And settlement of the debts at this time would clear the way for new borrowings, would make possible increased European armaments, and lead toward those business involvements that facilitate our participation in movements to "make the world safe for democracy."

As things stand today, we should say it is the part of wisdom neither to press for payment of the war debts nor to accept a compromise settlement, welcome as the money would be in the face of our own internal borrowings. The debts are just about our best possible form of antiwar insurance, and the law that prevents nations in default from borrowing more money from us until the old debts are liquidated is, in some degree at least, a good thing for the people of Europe. Lack of present easy money and the ability to borrow it in the future tends to hold warlike rulers in leash, and to be of service to those American and European nations that are sincerely opposed to any new wars. Incidentally, it is a little hard to see any gain of any sort if our debtors pay back the old war loans and begin to borrow from us to finance a new war. We should simply be traveling in a vicious circle.

WE WILL NOT BUY FRIENDSHIP WITH BLOOD OR DOLLARS

We must learn to assess European overtures at their true value. Nations are very much like individuals. When they want to borrow, the lender is a fine fellow. When he wants his money, they take the back streets to avoid him. Much as we should like to have the friendship of Europe, we do not want to buy it with blood or dollars.

Only a dumb nation has to learn the same lesson twice. Only a fool businessman believes that there are any profits in war. We are a friendly nation and we want to be a good neighbor, as the President puts it, but there is a limit to being a good neighbor when the man across the way is continually borrowing from one's household stores without repaying and tries to involve one in his rows with the scrappy neighbors on either side of him.

We should go all the way with our neighbors toward peace, but not one step toward war, or helping to finance wars. As long as Europe is headed that way, common prudence dictates that we should keep our pocketbook buttoned up and a strong line of insurance in force.

An accident policy should be written in legislation designed to prevent those incidents that might involve us in a foreign war. A second should be an investment policy, written in terms of the strongest possible defensive program that would safeguard us against attack. And a third might be an endowment policy, with, perhaps, the old war loans as a premium. Though expensive, it might prevent us from further squandering of our substance in other people's wars and assure us a comfortable old age.

THE ROAD TO THE HELL OF WAR IS PAVED WITH PROPHECY AND PROPAGANDA

Let me emphasize the fact with all the seriousness I can command that the price of peace is high, but no price is too high to pay for the lives of our young men. Only dictators, some so-called statesmen, and others safely beyond the reach of bomb and bullet believe that the blood-stained gains of war are worth the cost. And those gentlemen who keep stating in our press that we cannot keep out of a European war should be sent in a body to the front if we are drawn into one. The road to the hell of war is paved with prophecy and propaganda.

Are all these alleged obstacles to final adjudication of the war-debt question straw men, built up for selfish, self-serving purposes, or are they bona-fide reasons why the debts cannot be collected?

Mr. Chairman, in the last analysis are the taxpayers, the people of this country, to have their pockets picked to pay into the Treasury the sufficient sum to wipe off the books the amounts evidenced by loans to our war debtors? We want to know.

If we are opposed to cancelation, are in favor of collection, and we cannot collect and will not cancel, just where do we stand?

ARE OUR DEBTORS GOING TO PAY?

It is high time the people who expect these debts to be collected—and rightly assume from what we have undertaken to do that this can be done—it is high time, I say, they know whether they or those who are our debtors are going to pay. Now is the accepted time for us to find out what these debtors of ours are contemplating and proposing to do in their own interest, if not in ours.

The late Calvin Coolidge gave exact expression to the views of a majority of his fellow countrymen when, with that economy of words and precision of phrase which were characteristic of him, he said:

Well, they hired the money, didn't they?

"IF" AND "WHEN" AND "HOW"

The big little words "if" and "how" and "when" challenge us to action.

When desperate ills demand a speedy cure, distrust is cowardice and prudence folly, said somebody sometime, and we all remember, Mr. Chairman, Shakespeare's admonition:

> If it were done, when 'tis done, then 'twere well
> It were done quickly.

[Applause.]

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLUMLEY. Yes.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. May I inquire whether the gentleman is familiar with the Arabian proverb, which I believe to be quite apt, to the effect that "The first time he fooled you is his fault"?

Mr. PLUMLEY. I thank the gentleman for his contribution. May I add that they are not fooling me for a minute? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont yields back 2 minutes.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. EICHER].

CONSTITUTIONAL INTENT AND JUDICIAL INTERPRETATION

Mr. EICHER. Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee, ever since the President sent us his message on judiciary reform each mail has brought me requests from newspapers or constituents—as it has to all my colleagues—for a statement of my position on the matter of authorizing an enlargement of the Supreme Court. The need for the application of a reasonable-age yardstick and the cutting of expenses and delays to litigants in the lower Federal courts seems to be unanimously acknowledged. Thus, it is proven that the violent outcry against the President's proposal as it affects the Supreme Court gets its principal impulse from those special interests which want no enlargement of Federal power.

The recent persistent use of the judicial veto—often by a bare majority—to strike down economic and social policy declared by the popularly elected Congress and Executive, presents a challenge to the processes of orderly democratic government that calls for the best thought of which the country is collectively capable. Although my growing concern for its adequate solution had led me during the past several years to give the entire subject intensive study, I did not feel prepared to make an immediate decision on the mechanics of the suggested bill. Without at all setting myself up in judgment on what others in places of official responsibility may have done, it has been my feeling that on a question of such far-reaching importance any legislator would be somewhat hasty if he declared himself categorically as to a specific corrective method right off the bat, be it either pro or con. The instantaneous pros might rightly be under the suspicion of not having fully canvassed the field of alternatives, and the hurried cons of entertaining an aboriginal regard for the mere personnel of the Supreme Court as a "sacred cow."

In arriving at my own conclusions much help has been derived from hearing and reading the observations of other Members and also from extensive reading and rereading of constitutional history. Even though the proposed legislation has not yet been taken up by the House Judiciary Committee for formal consideration, I believe it to be timely and appropriate for me to contribute my views to the discussions. In thus presenting the considerations that are guiding me, I do not expect to influence any minds that are still unsympathetic toward the policies and objectives of our administration, for it is not likely that the bill suggested by the President, or even any reasonable modification of it, would meet their favor. I do indulge the hope, however, that my reflections may be of some assistance to sincere friends and well-wishers of the present Government in resolving doubts that may have been raised by arguments of the opposition.

To begin with, we should constantly preserve in all our thinking the unquestioned premise that the President's proposal is 100 percent constitutional. In this entire welter of controversy no one of any intellectual responsibility has been heard to contend otherwise. As to the number of its personnel, the money to keep it a going concern, the extent of its appellate jurisdiction—in all these respects the Constitution leaves the Supreme Court subject to the absolute discretion of Congress.

The instant suggestion of an expansible membership, using the reasonable and customary retirement age of 70 as the control yardstick, is comparatively quite moderate in its possible effect upon the relative functions of our three departments of government. There is no shock to the Supreme Court either as an institution or as an entity in our triune system. Its majority judgment will continue to determine issues involving our civil rights and religious liberties. Each new Justice will enjoy the same lifetime independence, both in tenure and in salary, as those now on the bench. And the partisan inferences that the appointees of a Democratic President and a Democratic Senate will be less high-minded and patriotic just do not rise to the dignity of sane argument. To be sure, bare majority decisions will still be possible; but if the membership should ever rise as high as 15, it cannot be denied that under the sheer law of averages 8 minds out of 15 are more apt to be right than 5 out of 9, and their opinions should command correspondingly enhanced public confidence.

The proposal contemplates continued and untrammeled exercise by the Supreme Court of the power implied by Chief Justice Marshall to pass upon the constitutionality of all acts of Congress and of the legislatures of the several States. Although it is true that the Constitution contains no express authority for the assumption of such judicial function, my own legal background as an admitted practitioner in the Supreme Courts of my home State of Iowa, of Illinois, and of the United States, would make it extremely difficult, if not impossible, for me ever to subscribe to any of the many plans that have been advanced by increasingly strong segments of opinion, that would substantially curb or perhaps destroy that power, whether it be by statute or by constitutional amendment.

Where I quarrel, however, with the orthodox objectors to Supreme Court reform is in their repudiation of Marshall's supplemental pronouncements laying down the doctrine of unlimited, plenary, and expanding Federal power as the appropriate and intended guide in constitutional interpretation. This repudiation first occurred in the Dred Scott case, which was overruled by the Civil War. It again occurred in the child-labor decision of 1918 and has been repeated frequently since.

The practical result has been that the Supreme Court has usurped legislative power to a degree that would never have been possible had it adhered to the concept of constitutional intent as proclaimed by our greatest Chief Justice. I am prone to think, yes, I know, that had it not been for this departure by our Supreme Court from the landmarks erected by our founding fathers, preventing as it did the people's National Legislature from dealing with our undeniably national problems in a national way, the objectives of the political revolution known as the New Deal would have been attained by a process of more gradual evolution.

The prime problem in the maintenance of our Government as a workable constitutional democracy always has been and always will be the preservation of the fine balance among its three governmental arms that will keep each within its proper sphere and will prevent each from encroaching upon the due prerogatives of the others. As stated by Professor Laski in 1931, Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes exemplified his recognition of the precise place that the judiciary must occupy in upholding this balance by his ability to see that "the intent of the Constitution is always perverted if it is used to prevent the victory of a dominant opinion upon whose behalf the plea of reasonableness can be maintained upon evidence." The existing unbalance, in my opinion, with its resulting irrepressible conflict between the political and the judicial thought of the country is accounted for by the failure of the majority of our Supreme Court to hew to this line of democratic balance laid down by Justice Holmes.

It is to be presumed that all of us, regardless of our party affiliations, adhere to the principle of majority rule. Although there may be differences of opinion as to whether or not the mandate of the last four elections included endorsement of any specific method for accomplishment of the majority will, there can be no denial that the last two elections, at least, are resounding verdicts in favor of the social and economic reforms sponsored by the Roosevelt administration. If natural events in the last 4 years had placed on our Supreme Court several additional minds of so-called liberal philosophical bent, the minority, I take it, would have to agree it was all right and that our constitutional sun would probably still keep on rising each morning. What validity remains, then, in the contention that such a result becomes all wrong if the process of liberalization in the Supreme Court is accelerated by the exercise of a check that the Constitution itself plainly vests in the legislative branch of the Government? Do we not remember the furore raised by the opposition last fall when the President told the country that the economic royalists had in his first term met their match, and that in his second term they would meet their master?

Do we not know now that the charges of openly intended dictatorship implied from these words and heralded across the land by opposing newspapers and orators served only to swell the President's popular majorities? The verdict clearly was for any action within the Constitution that would bring the results the people have demanded. It is unthinkable, for instance, that the majority would have said, "Yes; we want these policies put into effect, but you must wait until enough judges voluntarily retire, even though Congress can constitutionally do it some other way."

So it will be seen I do not share the alarm of some that there will evolve a partisanly subservient or too liberal Court. Rather, in my judgment, the only substantial doubt that surrounds the President's proposal lies in the other direction, namely, in the probability, demonstrated by experience, that the new as well as the old members may feel so controlled by the accumulation of anti-Marshall precedents as to render uncertain the effectuation of the national policies that our administration stands for. Supplementing and following up the President's suggestion, therefore, it seems to me essential that there be a definition in the Constitution of its own intent that will not allow emasculation by resort to hair-splitting logic. I introduced on February 25 a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 248) for the submission of a constitutional amendment that would restore the yardstick used by Marshall. The material language is as follows:

> It is declared to be the intent of the Constitution that the legislative powers therein granted shall not be considered as diminished by any implied limitation thereof and shall embrace all powers that reasonably can be implied from the powers that are expressly set forth.

The foregoing language would restore the original meaning of the Constitution. The theory of implied powers that is reinforced in the latter part of the proposed amendment was strongly stated by Chief Justice Marshall in McCulloch against Maryland and has been followed rather consistently, although in its practical application it has been at times unduly limited. The first part of the proposed amendment would restore the principle held by Marshall in Gibbons against Ogden that if a power was given the Federal Government without any express limitations upon it, that power was unlimited in application. In the latter leading case he held the power of the United States over commerce among the States to be both complete and exclusive. It is in their repeated deviation from this principle that the Supreme Court majorities have so flagrantly invaded the legislative field as it was marked out by the framers of our Constitution. Concretely, under such a definition of Federal power, the Supreme Court could not continue to deny the right of Congress under the commerce clause to compel collective bargaining and to set up minimum standards in interstate industry, or under the taxing and spending power its right to make possible effective cooperation in agriculture. Any Justices insisting on such denial would clearly incur liability to the impeachment process.

But as practical men we are forced to recognize that if our administration's economic opposition fights a constitutional amendment in 13 selected States, its ratification can be delayed indefinitely. No demagogic flourishes about letting the people rule can eliminate that inescapable factor. The child-labor amendment, which every free-thinking citizen supports, is daily becoming a more and more glaring example. Resistance by misguided advocates of the superior sacredness of too narrowly defined property rights will continue to delay and prevent ratification of any amendment that would permit effective exercise by either Federal or State Government, of those powers that are now denied by judicial interpretation.

Then there persists the assured prospect that any amendment seeking in terms to extend Federal power to specific fields like agriculture or industry will, through the application of the doctrine of implied limitation of power, suffer emasculation by interpretation at the hands of any judicial majority that may entertain contrary economic or social notions. Certainly this would be true unless the amendment in its phraseology went to the unhappy, unnecessary, and disastrous extreme of complete obliteration of our federated system. The income-tax amendment, for example, confers the power to tax income "from whatever source derived." The Supreme Court majority, however, has already made three or four exceptions, including its own salaries. The following comment by Thomas Jefferson, made while our Republic was still in its experimental dawn, illuminates prophetically the peril to popular government that we now find on our doorstep:

> You will have a difficult task in curbing the judiciary in their enterprises on the Constitution. The judiciary, if rendered independent and kept strictly in their own departments, merits great confidence for their learning and integrity. But it now appears we have no law but the will of the judge. Never will chicanery have a more difficult task than has now been accomplished to warp the text of the law to the will of him who is to construe it. Our case is the more desperate as the attempt to make the law plainer by amendment is only throwing out new amendments for sophistry.

The Constitution as it is contains all the essential powers to keep us a workable democracy. That is why I believe the only amendment needed is one that will so unmistakably define its intent that an overriding Court would be guilty of judicial sedition.

So the cold, hard fact must be kept uppermost in the thinking of all of us that it is a "condition and not a theory" with which we have to deal, and the citizens of America need to face it as practical men and women. The masses want old-age and retirement security, sound banks of deposit, living wages and decent working conditions, appropriately graduated for women and children, living prices for the products of their toil—in short, they want to stop getting poorer while the rich are getting richer. Unless the downward trend of the early thirties remains reversed, the Bill of Rights will "become as sounding brass and tinkling cymbals", and all the supreme courts in the world cannot preserve it. That is the stuff of which dictatorships are made—not of executive or legislative power freely given at the ballot box by a thinking people. In my section of the country, if hogs again go to 2 cents and corn to 8 cents, will a continued denial of Federal power over a Federal problem remain popular medicine? Or will law and the courts again tremble from mob manifestations as they did in our own northwest Iowa? Do we want to go back to the business, social, and general economic conditions as we all knew them—in fact, experienced them—in 1932?

The concern felt by some Democrats that this legislation involves a departure from the party's traditional position on State rights I do not share. Jefferson contended for greater reserved authority in the States because he considered this would best serve the economic welfare of the common man, and in his day that was true. The slave power in the generations preceding the Civil War resisted the expansion of Federal power under the interstate commerce clause to prevent Federal interference with interstate traffic in slaves. Now the concentrated economic power of the country, greater than many of our State governments, and wielded largely with other people's money, resists the expansion of Federal power for the same economic reasons as did the slave-holding interests in the ante-bellum days, and by the same token the salvation of the present-day economic slave can come only through the one remaining authority that his masters fear and respect. The Supreme Court majority has been no protagonist of the theory of reserved power in the States in their capacity as units of sovereignty. It has repeatedly placed stifling construction on such claims. It is only at the behest of private interests, seeking to defeat the exertion of effective Federal authority, that it has enlarged the implied reservoir of exclusive State initiative.

An exception that proves the rule occurred last Monday, when, in the Washington State minimum-wage case, the majority came up to the mourner's bench and pleaded guilty to a half dozen larcenies of State legislative power. Less than a year ago in the New York wage and hour case Justice Roberts was the fifth mind comprising the majority to deny the right of State government to humanize working conditions for women in industry. Three days ago he changed his mind and became one of the majority to uphold that right. Could a king's power over the lives and fortunes of millions of women workers be more absolute? One need search no further for the dictator that opponents of court reform picture as hiding under every bed.

This last majority opinion justifies its reversal of the Adkins decision of 1923 by the plea of changes in economic conditions—verily a confession out of its own mouth that it was "legislating" in 1923 instead of keeping within its constitutional bounds of "declaring the law." Thus we have a persuasive example right at hand of how one human mind can and does amend our Constitution at will. But Justice Roberts' penitent lifting of the due process ban on State power by no means meets the national call. Unified State action by the compact method to solve the national problems facing agriculture and industry is simply impossible of achievement. Even the "hot oil" troubles of the Southwestern States are too big to be taken care of by cooperative State action.

So, to my fellow Democrats I say that it all depends on whether you want to continue shouting a vain shibboleth, or whether you want to fight for restoration of the substance of a constitutional democracy—a substance that will consider the man before vested property—that will indeed promote the greatest good of the greatest number.

Nor am I concerned over any specific legislation that may come up for enactment or reenactment in Congress if a loose-constructionist Supreme Court should be in prospect. I voted for the A. A. A. as an emergency measure, believing it to be within the intent of the Constitution. I voted against the Bankhead Cotton Act and the Kerr Tobacco Act because of their compulsory features and my conviction that attempted stabilization of price by a policy of limitation of production was not a permanent or sound solution of our agricultural problem. Under my present lights I would do so again, for I believe the majority of the people in my district agree with me. At the same time, my conviction is no less firm that the welfare of agriculture is a national problem, which our National Government should have ample authority to deal with in accordance with the will of the majority of our citizens. The people's Congress, that the majority has the power at the ballot box to elect or reject, should have the right, by a process of trial and error, if need be, to discover and enact the policies that, in the opinion of the majority, will best serve the general welfare, and that right should not be circumscribed to the point of negation by a judiciary that under our system is entirely without accountability or responsibility except its own "sense of self-restraint."

Much to-do is made that it is intended to reenact the N. R. A., and that even six new judges would not help. It is true that N. R. A., as applied to localized business, was held unconstitutional by a unanimous Court, and rightly so. But as applied to basic key and mass-production industries, enjoying Nation-wide markets under the freedom of the interstate-commerce clause, I am convinced that Federal provision for collective bargaining, minimum wages, maximum hours, and decent working conditions would not be held unconstitutional by a unanimous Court, although a bare majority of the present Court has done so. The House recently voted to extend to the coal industry governmental cooperation in interstate commerce in maintaining cost-of-production prices to remedy the chaos resulting from cutthroat competition. The same cooperation must sooner or later be given agriculture to overcome the chaos caused by cutthroat speculative price fixing of the farmer's products; and a revival of N. R. A. principles that will accord equal consideration to agriculture and to industry will have my enthusiastic support.

The sum of the whole matter, it appears to me, is that the country is forced to make a choice between yielding to a judicial dictatorship and a resulting indefinite period of stagnation and impotency, in fact, paralysis in Government, on the one hand, and administering, on the other hand, a corrective shock, not to the Supreme Court as an institution but to the combination of human minds that by the mere accident of time happens to comprise it just at this most critical juncture in social and economic relations, both at home and abroad.

The shock involved in the President's proposal is minimized by its establishment of a permanent system of voluntary retirement and a permanent method for offsetting the refusal of eligible Justices to take advantage of it.

At the appropriate time in our deliberations I believe consideration might profitably be given to the possibility of strengthening the President's plan by providing for automatic stabilization of the Court's permanent membership at an agreed number, possibly 11. A top limit in emergency appointments seems unnecessary since their number is automatically determined by age. Such stabilization would permit future emergency increases if members stay on after reaching the voluntary retirement age. The number "11" is suggested for permanent membership because it would distribute more widely the single feature of Supreme Court work, namely, the writing of opinions, that now produces excessive strain, and would make it possible to handle less important cases with a quorum of seven. This would furnish additional time for the preparation of opinions and would not interfere with the unity of the Court. I make this observation with diffidence in view of Chief Justice Hughes' recent advisory opinion, but it is to be noted that he failed to mention the complete regulatory power over appeals given by the Constitution to Congress. Furthermore, if his opinion is correct, then the Supreme Court of my home State of Iowa has for years been acting unconstitutionally, for there, too, judicial power is vested in "a supreme court", and yet it works in two divisions, with provision on proper showing for rehearing before the full bench.

I wonder, also, if there has not been an unfortunate misapprehension as to the relationship between the age of Justices and the problem to be solved through retirements or collateral appointments based on age. The problem of age is one that develops collectively from the duration of tenure. Every time a great change in political thought produces a corresponding change in political control of the National Government, the Supreme Court because of lifetime tenure lags behind the legislative and executive branches. The result is a stalemate in the functioning of democratic government due to the Court's control of one generation with the thought processes of the preceding generation. There is probably not a single case of individual unfitness due to age among the present members of the Supreme Court, but the problem of tenure can most fairly be solved on the basis of age. The 70-year limit, therefore, is simply a protective device to enable each generation to rule itself. It is a control measure, not a yardstick on individual fitness. If this were more clearly understood, there would undoubtedly be less resentment among members of the Supreme Court and also, perhaps, among some Members of the House and Senate. Such a protective device is the simplest, fairest, and least disturbing possible under the Constitution, and would so appear to everybody if it were possible to detach the proposal from the effect it is expected to have upon the interpretation of constitutional intent as to Federal power.

No open mind can honestly be alarmed over the cry of "dictator." The President can appoint no man to the Supreme Court without the consent of the Senate and can exercise no control over the Justices after appointment. His basic purpose is to restore power to Congress which has been taken away by the Supreme Court. Thus he would strengthen democratic processes against the real threat of dictatorship, which lies in popular revolt against a helpless government.

Again, the President's plan does not create an appointive power which might be misused by some other occupant of the White House. It creates no precedent, although it strengthens those set up by Adams, Jefferson, Jackson, Lincoln, and Grant. Everything that is now being said against changing the number of Justices was said and better said in the debates on those occasions. The plan establishes an orderly process, if modified so as to provide for automatic stabilization at a lesser number than 15, which would be available to any administration. Should a reactionary administration come into power, it would not need a reactionary Supreme Court in order to tear down the New Deal and turn the country over to predatory interests. That can be done by mere repeal of laws. Any government that is satisfied to "ride the waves" is neither hampered or helped by the attitude of the judicial department.

After all, is not the basic question just this: whether five Justices, hold-overs from a past generation, shall be permitted to ruin the second Roosevelt administration, and ruin the country as well, by binding the National Government in a strait jacket, with no constitutional question involved except that five Justices say the Constitution means one thing, three Justices equally learned say it means the opposite thing, and the Chief Justice himself hears his own words come rumbling from the past: "We are under a Constitution, but the Constitution is what the judges say it is."

In conclusion, let me say, therefore, that, entertaining the convictions that I do, I shall wholeheartedly support the President's proposal. I believe its adoption will help restore our governmental balance, without which our country cannot remain a workable constitutional democracy. At the same time, and as a supplemental remedy, I think there should be submitted to the country an amendment that will eliminate all question of the Constitution's intent on this great issue of Federal power under our dual sovereignty system and that will assure interpretations permitting the majority's will to prevail in the solution of social and economic problems which are national in their character and influence. [Applause.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH].

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, it is customary when one takes the floor for 10 minutes or any longer time that he have an opportunity to think over the particular things he wants to talk about, and a great many Members of the House feel as though they should have a prepared speech on such occasions. Not belonging in the category of a speech maker, I sometimes feel that we humble servants of the people, if we talk from the heart and speak of the things we have in mind, sometimes may do just as much good, provided we discuss them from the angle of trying to be of some real service to our country. This is the way in which I prefer to talk to the membership of the House.

On Thursday last I called attention to the fact that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM], the spokesman of this administration, was going to take the floor of the House and that he would at that time no doubt give us some sound advice.

I was somewhat perturbed because of the fact I have been placed on the subcommittee having in charge the Interior appropriation bill, and they have housed me up in a corner of the Capitol now to serve the Appropriation Committee, and I cannot be on the floor quite so much. I feel rather bad about this, because I enjoyed the association with the Members of the House on the floor and I always liked to be present on the floor to see what was going on and to take any part I can. However, the duties of this committee assignment are such that it is necessary for me to be out of the Chamber much of the time, to my regret.

However, the main issue involved in the speech of the gentleman from Virginia I think should be enlarged upon at this time, and I am very sorry that the gentleman is not now on the floor at this moment; he was here a few minutes ago. I sent word to him that I was going to say something about his speech, but I would 10 times rather talk to the gentleman in person than I would to talk here on the floor when the gentleman is not present. I have always taken the position that if I had anything to say about a Member of Congress or any individual I should say it to his face and not behind his back. I believe if we would do this we would always have a better understanding, and in the end much more would be accomplished. Honest criticism is good for anyone, and if we can criticize a person with respect to the promises he has made or the things he has done, in an effort to get him to change his course, we may be of service as representatives of the people.

I desire to call your attention to the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia, in part, when he was speaking of the wonderful work he considers the President of the United States has been doing. The gentleman is a loyal supporter of the President, and is a man who believes in a great many of the things the President has done. Sometimes I question whether he believes in everything that is being done by the administration. The fact of the matter is, if I were to pass judgment on that, I would say that he does not, but being a loyal supporter of the administration, the gentleman feels he should do those things that his boss tells him to do, and by his remarks the gentleman has well stated that fact.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I would like to ask the gentleman whether or not his remarks are calculated to make the President or the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] change his course.

Mr. RICH. I want to change the course of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] because he is an administration spokesman, and I want to change the course of the President of the United States, but most of all, I want to change the course of Members of the Congress who, Mr. WOODRUM states, get their orders from the Chief Executive of the United States and do his bidding, and I will show the gentleman that he made that statement, because this is simply leading up to the fact that the administration spokesman states you are nothing but rubber stamps. But he makes that only in an insinuation that the President is the one whom you should support and who should tell you what to do. I personally do not think so if you are intelligent enough to think for yourselves. And I think you men ought to have minds enough of your own to do those things which you in your own individual capacity think ought to be done. Mr. WOODRUM says:

We should speed to the task of achieving another objective which has been delayed of necessity, and that is the one that calls for a more even balance between our income and our public expenditures.

In this I heartily agree.

Then he goes on to make some other statements in reference to the President of the United States. Mr. WOODRUM, so far as the administration is concerned, has given you a mighty fine address, and I do not want to detract from that, but I want to impress on your minds your responsibility. He says further:

I do not believe that we shall ever again approximate the cost of government which we had a few years ago; so if any of us are so optimistic as to look forward to the day when we shall be back to a $1,000,000,000 Budget again, forget it. That cannot come, nor should it come.

You Members of Congress know, and I realize, that possibly we will never get back to a billion-dollar budget, and I question whether we ever ought to get back to it, because the expansion of government is becoming greater and greater each year, but I want you to think of this: We are operating on an $8,000,000,000 budget—eight times the amount that Mr. WOODRUM suggests as the administration spokesman. Who is responsible for our being on an $8,000,000,000 budget? I say this administration. Do you say that you have no responsibility for that? Does any Member of Congress say that he is not responsible for the expenditure of Treasury funds to the extent of $8,000,000,000 annually. Gracious goodness! We have not only expended $8,000,000,000, but last Congress appropriated more than $10,000,000,000. I do not want to do any prognosticating here as to what Congress will do, but I tell you that you are on the road to appropriating at this session of Congress more money than you appropriated last session of Congress. Is not that a serious situation? Is not that something for you and something for me to consider as individuals?

Mr. GREEVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. Let me go on with the gentleman from Virginia. If I am going to get a few minutes only, I have to complete this statement of the gentleman from Virginia. He says that you gentlemen are supposed to walk to the tune of the President of the United States in anything that he says. I yield.

Mr. GREEVER. I agree with a lot of the things that the gentleman has said, and I ask the gentleman if he does not think we have expanded too fast with a lot of these facilities of government and brought on an expenditure of a lot of money that ought to be cut out by cutting out certain of these agencies that have been extended in the last few years.

Mr. RICH. I say to the gentleman from Wyoming, for whom I have the greatest respect, that he is absolutely right. He senses the situation that the expansion which we have started out on has come to a point it should not ever have reached. We developed that in the hearings this morning on the Interior Department appropriation bill, where the expansion goes on each year and adds greatly to our expense annually, causing the Federal Treasury to become more and more burdened each year by the propositions that we have launched.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 minutes more.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. Let me complete this first. It is a hard thing for me to stand on the floor and think and make a speech. If we were sitting at a table I could talk all day.

Mr. PIERCE. The gentleman does not need to offer any excuses.

Mr. RICH. But the expansion of the various proposals that we have entered into create a greater demand upon the Federal Treasury. Where they are self-sustaining, where they will help pay their own costs, I am for them, and I shall go with the gentleman from Wyoming, or any of you men, to the limit in advancing money to establish a proposal that is going ultimately to revert to the interest and welfare of the American people, where it will make for the more abundant life, but where it is not going to be self-sustaining after we have it established, where we establish proposals that are going to be a continuous drain on the Federal Treasury, then I think we ought to do our best to curb such proposals, something I know the gentleman from Wyoming will be only too glad to do. We should use great care in the things the Government is responsible in advancing; they should benefit the whole people, not sections, not classes, not any individual.

Mr. PIERCE rose.

Mr. RICH. In just a few moments, and then I shall yield. Mr. WOODRUM said:

What has this man in the White House done? Name an act that he has done.

He speaks there of anything that he did that is not consistent with good business policy, and the best way for me is to suggest some of those things that the President of the United States did that I do not agree with altogether, even in the time of emergency. We claim now that the emergency is over, and I think we should get back to some of those sound fundamentals of government. Here is one statement that I want to take exception to in the address delivered by the gentleman from Virginia, and I want you men who are Representatives in Congress to get this point:

No criticism or no aspersions today, no matter where they come from, can dim the lustre of that service. The people of America trusted him in 1932, and, thank God, they did not trust him in vain. They continued to trust him in 1934 and again in 1936, and in 1937 the people of America looked for continued leadership, not in Congress, not in any other branch of the Government, but in the White House of this Nation.

That is the statement I take exception to. That is the same statement that was excepted to by one of the Members on the floor of the House of Representatives. Let us give the President of the United States all credit for anything he has done and has been able to do to relieve suffering and to make this a better place in which to live. I want to do everything that is possible to that very end, but I must of necessity call your attention to the statements that were made by the President of the United States several years ago. We will come back then to the question that is now being very seriously considered by the gentlemen in the other branch of Congress, who called the leaders of the House of Representatives to come over to the other side of the Capitol and talk over the tax situation, because the tax bill that was passed last year, that iniquitous tax bill disbursing incomes that has tended to tear down industry, and has not produced the revenues they thought were coming from it when they imposed it on the people of this country. It is falling short over $100,000,000. So it has caused the chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate great worry. Rightfully it should. It ought to teach the chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate and members of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives that they should change that iniquitous tax bill. It is a detriment to any corporation, and a loss in taxes, and an injury to the common sense of sound-thinking men. Understand, I am in favor of taxes in proportion to the ability of the people to pay, but I believe we should make tax bills that are not going to tend to wreck the business institutions of this country, and that they should change those features and put the income tax in the proper form that the more a man makes the more he ought to pay. That is sound and sensible, and I am for it in every way possible.

I am first for economy in our Government spending before I am for more taxes.

Let me call attention to what the President of the United States said about taxes:

I shall use this position of high responsibility to discuss up and down the country at all seasons and at all times the duty of reducing taxes and of increasing the efficiency of government and of cutting out the underbrush around our Government structure and of getting the most public service for every dollar paid by taxation. This I pledge you, but nothing I have said in the campaign transcends in importance this covenant with the taxpayers of this country.

That statement was made by Franklin D. Roosevelt in Sioux City on September 29, 1932. I could give other quotations just as sensible, but the President of the United States has simply forgotten the matter of taxation when it comes to spending. Mr. President, you must economize to make your previous assertions good. Why do not you do it? You know he was born of rich parentage. He has inherited a lot of money. If you look at his record in New York State he made an awful blunder in the spending he did in New York State, and they have been burdened ever since. Then he came down to the Capital, and he is doing the same thing in Washington. We have to change that course. So I criticize in a friendly way to get him to do it. We want to get the President of the United States to understand that he cannot make a statement like that and then go back on it. I like a man who says a thing and then means what he says.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield now to the former Governor of Oregon, a man whom I like very much.

Mr. PIERCE. I sympathize much with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but it is one of the hardest things on earth to cut down these expenses. I would like to have something specified by the gentleman, who has given so much time and thought to this subject. As I have stated, I firmly believe he is one of the Members of this Congress who has done more than anyone to constantly keep this before the Congress. Specify where.

Will you cut down relief? In face of the present world condition, are you going to cut down the Army, the Navy, and the airplanes? Are you going to cut down the activities of government? Nobody would complain more than our colleague from Wyoming [Mr. GREEVER] if you cut down irrigation. Where are you going to start in?

Mr. RICH. I have been asking all the time, "Where are you going to get the money?" Now the gentleman wants to know where are we going to cut down expenses? [Laughter.]

Mr. PIERCE. Yes.

Mr. RICH. I am glad to have the opportunity. That is what I expected the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] would do, but the gentleman from Virginia only casually referred to it. That was my disappointment in his speech. The gentleman from Oregon has asked a sensible question, "Where are you going to do it?" When the President of the United States took office there were 11,000,000 people out of work.

Mr. KITCHENS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I am answering the gentleman from Oregon, and it is going to take quite a while. [Laughter.]

The President of the United States says we are going to spend millions of dollars to prime the pump. Instead of spending millions, the President of the United States has spent over $16,000,000,000 to prime this pump, and where have we gotten to? According to the records of the P. W. A. census of unemployment, on January 15 we find there were something over 6,000,000 people out of work.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has again expired.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

Mr. RICH. Thank you. The last of February Mr. Green, of the American Federation of Labor, said there were 10,041,000 out of work. Now there is only a difference of a million people who are employed today more than there were in 1933.

So we see that on the basis of spending $16,000,000,000 and putting only 1,000,000 people back to work in industry, we are going to require a great number of years to put them all back to work, and I am afraid Mr. Roosevelt will not then be in the White House. Besides that, we are going to have this Nation so far in debt that it will be wrecked. It will never survive the present rate of spending.

Mr. PIERCE. Yes; but answer the question.

Mr. RICH. I want to show the gentleman what his party has done.

To get the people back in industry, the first thing we must do is to regulate mass production so that the people will be placed on the pay rolls of industry rather than on the pay rolls of the Government of the United States. When a person talks about regulating mass production, the first thing he hears is, "Oh, you want to go back to the pick and shovel to do work the steam shovel should do." That is the first thing they talk about. It is really silly to me when that attitude is taken. The first thing, then, you say, is that you are going to try to hinder advancement. Well, we might have to retard a little advancement just for a short time; but let me make a few observations about the N. R. A. When we established the N. R. A. in order to eliminate child labor and in order to secure minimum wages—I advocated both these aims in the first months I came to Congress in 1930—do you know, Governor, that I went down to the labor temple to try to get support? I talked to these fellows down in the labor temple, but there was not one man in sympathy with it. The men who opposed that were the labor leaders of this country. Think of it. Now they are gradually coming back to agree with us. The only representative of labor—and I give credit to that gentleman and take off my hat to him—who favored the minimum wage and abolition of child labor was Mr. Stewart, then the head of the Government Employees Union. That man said, "I am for it." He was the pioneer of the labor element that was for the elimination of child labor and for the adoption of the minimum wage, more particularly the minimum wage.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I cannot. I must answer the Governor's question or the Governor will think I am trying to sidestep him, and I do not want to do that. [Laughter.]

Let me give you a little illustration drawn from personal experience, Governor. In my business as a textile manufacturer they use automatic looms. They are of such a nature that one operator can operate as many as eight looms, and one operator does operate eight looms. This could be regulated. We could go back to the time when we had one operator on a loom. That for a limited time. That is a specific instance, and we have many parallel in the textile industry. The manufacturers and the business people of this country are alert to conditions to save expenses and you cannot blame them. We let them go ahead. If they spend the $1,800 or $2,000 additional for an automatic loom, the cost of the machine to the manufacturer is a mighty good investment because he can cut down his overhead and this saving in 4 or 5 years will pay for the looms. But at the same time it will decrease the number of employees by 25 or 50 percent, or maybe 75 percent. This is just one item to place hundreds of people on the pay roll of industry instead of on the Government pay roll.

If we put into the hands of the Labor Department the matter of controlling automatic machinery, much as I do not like the things Miss Perkins is doing I would say for goodness sake let her have that to do. She would then have a job that she might be able to do and I feel sure it can be done if enlarged upon to a successful conclusion of employing the unemployed.

Mr. PIERCE. But the gentleman does not think for a minute that that would take care of any considerable percentage of the unemployed, does he?

Mr. RICH. Oh, gracious goodness! That is only one infinitesimal unit. The illustration I gave from the woolen business is less than one-tenth of 1 percent of the things she could do in that field.

Mr. PIERCE. When you cut down the billion and a half relief bill that the gentleman and I have got to vote for or against in a few days——

Mr. RICH. A billion and a half?

Mr. PIERCE. Yes; a billion and a half.

Mr. RICH. Gracious goodness, Governor, they are going to come here with a request for $4,000,000,000.

Mr. PIERCE. No.

Mr. RICH. The gentleman is behind the times. The gentleman has already voted $1,000,000,000, or at least $789,000,000, this session.

Mr. PIERCE. They will be back for a billion and a half. Now, when you cut that down——

Mr. RICH. You are behind the times, Governor; they will be back for several more billions out of this Congress for relief.

Mr. PIERCE. If we cut that down how are we going to feed these people?

Mr. RICH. When I was a little boy back in the country my father said to me: "Robert, if you want to do something get out and work." He said: "Work long hours and save part of every pay check. If you do that you will be able to get ahead." This administration, however, has told people that they do not have to work, that the administration would pay them large sums of money to sit down or run around and enjoy all the privileges there are in life. Now, we cannot continue going on that scale; it must be curbed.

Mr. PIERCE. The gentleman has not yet answered my question; he is not specific.

Mr. RICH. The gentleman does not give me time.

Mr. PIERCE. But I want the gentleman to tell me how he is going to cut down on these things. I want him to be specific.

Mr. RICH. Does the gentleman want to know what I would do? I would cut it down to the very limit. I would make it $1,000,000,000 or $1,100,000,000 instead of $4,000,000,000; and then I would put the handling of this money back into the local communities.

Take in your district, the local people know the conditions and they know what your people actually need. They can take care of themselves. They know who want to work. They know how much is necessary to live on. The local fellows have the picture of the people before them and they will do what is necessary to see that they are taken care of. The trouble with this administration, as it has been handled, is they want to pay them more than industry can afford to pay in lots of cases. I am not speaking so much of the North as I am down South. You live in the North and we do not want those fellows down South to know this—this is a joke. If you will look at the record sent to you by Miss Perkins the other day, in which she gave the price of common labor, the minimum they pay in the North is 25 cents for common labor and it goes as high at 80 cents. Down South it is 11.1 cents up to almost 25 cents. Think of the difference between what they are getting down South and what they are getting up North. Then they holler and criticize us up North because we are not paying people what they claim these people should be paid. It is awful when you think about the vast difference between the North and South in payment of labor. I thought all of those differences had been overcome, and it should be nearer than that.

If we are going to take care of these people out of the Federal Treasury we ought to leave it in the hands of the local people and not let Mr. Hopkins lay down a price that should be paid to the people of the South and the people of the North. Up North they go higher than is the case with the people down South. Why does Mr. Hopkins set such high rates so the Government has to take care of those people down South? They are good, honest, conscientious people and will be taken care of in a way in which they ought to be taken care of. Mr. Hopkins does not know a thing about it. He pays more for relief than southern industries can pay; thus they want to be on relief and not work in their chosen fields of endeavor.

Mr. PIERCE. Is not the gentleman well aware of the fact that the local people can be imposed upon more easily than an outsider who may control the district and who is not acquainted with the personal cases?

Mr. RICH. No, no; a thousand times no.

Mr. PIERCE. The gentleman would if he had any experience in an executive office. He would know if he wants anything enforced he would have to send an outside man, and the outside man would come nearer getting it done than a local man, who may be influenced by local opinion.

Mr. RICH. There is some merit in what the gentleman says. But these outside men do not know the conditions. The Administration is putting politicians in there—that is the trouble. If they would stop this placing of politicians in those jobs and would get businessmen in there, men who know the conditions, men who would know what they were talking about, God only knows we would get some place. But take up in the State of Pennsylvania. They talk a lot about Penrose and how things were corrupt politically up there when he was in power. If you know anything about the men they call Guffey, Earle, Kelly & Co., you would know how rotten things are run in Pennsylvania politics today. Such corruption has never existed in the State of Pennsylvania before. It is more rotten than it has ever been. That is the trouble with administration of relief. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. NICHOLS].

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, I want to say at the outset the thing I contemplate doing tomorrow when this bill is read for amendment is one not at all to my liking. May I also say that I have the deepest respect and the highest regard for the gentleman from Mississippi, the chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations having to do with the District of Columbia. In anything that might be done tomorrow in an effort to delete certain provisions from this bill, if it should occur to any Member that anything I do or any other member of the Committee on the District of Columbia should do, is an attempt to reflect upon the chairman of that subcommittee or the subcommittee itself, I take this opportunity of advising the membership that that is the farthest from the minds of those who will probably raise some points of order against this bill. Many parts of this appropriation bill contain legislative provisions and attempts to change existing law. Many parts of the bill, in my judgment, are subject to points of order. I am a member of the legislative Committee on the District of Columbia. I think there is probably not a Member of this House who will not agree with me that that in itself is not a very desirable position. But since I am a member of that committee, I want to do those things which impress me as being the proper thing to do.

It is the duty of that committee to provide by legislation for the legislative needs of the District of Columbia. There has recently been submitted for the consideration of this Congress a report known as the Jacobs report, which is a very voluminous document and on which I think there was expended some $50,000 by those men who compiled the document. In it are contained many suggestions which would change the fiscal relationship of the Government of the United States and the government of the District of Columbia. In it are contained many suggestions for legislative change and many suggestions for change in the system and mode of taxation within the District of Columbia.

The chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia at the opening of this session of Congress appointed two subcommittees, one to be a legislative committee and the other a tax committee, each committee to study those two subjects in this Jacobs report. These committees went to work. I was appointed chairman of the subcommittee on the legislative branch and the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. KENNEDY] was appointed chairman of the subcommittee on taxation. Between ourselves we agreed that probably the problem could be best met by sitting in joint session. So those two subcommittees sat in joint session for the consideration of these matters.

After some 2 or 3 weeks we concluded that the problem of legislation and the problem of tax reform was so closely related that they were problems which should be treated as one; therefore, we recommended to the chairman of the District of Columbia Committee that those two committees be recalled and that a new subcommittee be appointed and set up to consider the Jacobs report as one committee.

This was done, and the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. KENNEDY] is now chairman of the subcommittee. It is the very function of this subcommittee, which has been for a long time holding hearings, to determine, first, what shall be the fiscal relationship between the Government of the United States and the government of the District of Columbia, and second, whether there should be legislative changes or legislative reforms enacted to carry out the conclusions reached by this subcommittee.

By reason of the fact that it is our job to do this, we are rather jealous of the privilege of doing it well or poorly, as the case may be; and we do object to the usurpation by the Subcommittee on Appropriations for the District of Columbia of the power which is rightly and properly ours. Certainly no one will say it is within the province of a Committee on Appropriations to pass legislation as such.

Many of the provisions contained in this bill are splendid provisions. Many of the provisions of this bill which are legislation, and to which points of order will be directed, in my opinion are very good pieces of legislation. But is it the orderly, the proper way to approach the problem? Thinking that it is not, I think it is clearly the duty of the legislative committee for the District of Columbia to determine what legislation shall be presented to the House for consideration.

As I stated at the outset, I shall direct points of order to many portions of this bill. I take the floor today only for the purpose of pointing out to the members of this committee that the purpose in so doing is not to pick a quarrel with the Committee on Appropriations, it is not to look askance at the able members of the subcommittee, who have done a wonderful job on this appropriation bill and who have worked hard on it, but so that it cannot be said we are making the points of order for a single reason other than that since the committee of which I am a member has been given a job to do, we insist on being privileged to do this job.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

THE LABOR CRISIS

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, for a long time those who are sincerely interested in maintaining the American form of government and American liberty have become increasingly disturbed. For the last 2 months there has been an epidemic of labor unrest.

No one in America objects to the workingman joining a labor union if he wants to. No one objects to the labor union bargaining for its members with employers if the employees want to do it that way, but when it comes to the point where labor indulges in sit-down strikes in buildings owned or occupied by the employer and the court orders their eviction and the Governor, as in Michigan, refuses to aid the local authorities in enforcing the law, and the President of the United States by his silence approves that failure, then we have reached a pass in the processes of evolution where there is no government. With such a situation as this it is absolutely impossible to expect private capital to embark upon new enterprises to provide for an increase in the demand for goods and to place the people of this country at work.

When similar situations arose in Indiana, Governor Townsend maintained the government and stopped them. When similar situations arose in the State of Connecticut, Governor Cross maintained the government and stopped them. When similar situations arose in Auburn and Lewiston, Maine, Governor Barrows maintained the government. Likewise, the Governors of New Jersey and Illinois arose to the occasion when these situations arose in their States, and all of these men are to be honored for their action in maintaining the government in their respective States. The people demand that the government be maintained.

Imagine Grover Cleveland or Woodrow Wilson sitting by with such a situation!

The spending program, the tax program, and the regimentation program of the administration have held back recovery and the placing of people at work for at least 3 years. Now the failure of the Government itself is holding back the progress of recovery.

It is apparent that the Chief Executive lacks the courage, the character, and the patriotism to maintain the Government and to enforce law. Such outstanding labor leaders as the president of the American Federation of Labor, Mr. Green, have denounced this violation of the law as a step which was detrimental to the progress of organized labor. Such performances have been prohibited and stopped in Great Britain. Such performances have been prohibited and stopped even in France, but here in America we must hang our heads and say that we have no government.

The only possible result of the continued failure of the Chief Executive to maintain the Government is the destruction of private industry and the establishment of socialism or communism, with an absolute dictator.

Such a dictatorship means:

First. A fixing of the price and the hours of labor by the dictator.

Second. It means a lowering of the wage standards of America, due to the inefficiency of the socialistic or communistic form of government which must be adopted.

Third. It means an end of the freedom of the workingman and an end to his right to collective bargaining or individual bargaining for his own labor.

It means the enslavement of the American people.

God grant that there may be instilled into the American people a realization of what is being done to them and that they will rise in their might and by their demands for Executive and legislative protection of their liberties bring about a restoration of ordinary processes of government and an opportunity for private industry to continue and the workingman to retain his liberties. [Applause.]

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. MAY. Does the gentleman know of any country in the world today under a dictatorship which has not as its first major move taken away from the average workingman and the poor class of people every one of their rights?

Mr. TABER. They have all done it. In Germany and Italy this has been pronounced. I understand, although I am not so familiar with the history of it, in Spain it has been pronounced.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRADLEY].

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. Chairman, in the past few days quite a few remarks have been made in this Chamber about the sit-down strikes. After listening to the addresses of some of the Members of this House, I have come to the conclusion their solution of the sit-down strike problem would be for the Governor of the State of Michigan to send the armed forces of that State against the men who are striving to improve their condition of livelihood.

Very little has been said concerning the evils which have been responsible not only for the sit-down strikes but for every other strike in our industrial system. Last week a gentleman from Michigan in the course of his remarks on the floor of this House mentioned the General Motors Corporation. I asked him if he was in a position to inform the House as to the capital structure of the General Motors Corporation. He stated he was not, but that in his opinion this feature was of little importance.

I think it is of a great deal of importance. I think the capital structure of these corporations, the manner in which they have pyramided their stocks, the load which they have placed upon the back of labor, the fact the Congress and even the Supreme Court of the United States when the Congress has attempted to protect the worker have evaded responsibility, permitting the worker to be exploited by the gigantic corporations, are of paramount importance.

Take as an example the Chrysler Motor Corporation. The root of all the difficulties which beset this country today lies in the fact we have allowed our corporations to pursue a course which concentrates the wealth of this country in their hands.

The Chrysler Corporation, when it was first organized, had a certain number of shares of stock. Some years later, by a mere stroke of the pen, they split that up 4 for 1. There was no new investment of capital. They simply said that where $1 of investment existed before there is now $4; and in the year 1936, believe it or not, the Chrysler Motor Corporation paid dividends of $48 a share on the same investment which only paid $3 a share in 1925. Forty-eight dollars on the same capital investment on which they paid $3.

Now, let us take the case of the General Motors Corporation. The General Motors Corporation, the present corporation, was organized in 1916. At that time they had 826,000 shares of stock. Today, unbelievable as it may seem, through constant split-ups, repeated stock dividends, the General Motors Corporation had 43,500,000 shares of stock. As against an original capital-stock investment of 826,000 shares, 43,500,000 shares.

Think of the load they have placed upon the back of labor and upon the consumer, and organized government has done nothing to protect the worker from this exploitation; and in the year 1936 the General Motors Corporation paid dividends on the common stock of approximately $200,000,000 when their original common-stock investment was placed upon their books at only $82,000,000, and they paid dividends of $200,000,000 in 1936.

Then I repeat that Chrysler paid $48 worth of dividends on the identical investment which yielded $3 in 1925. Justify that, if you can.

Now we have a sit-down strike which has been pursued in certain stores of the Woolworth Corporation, the 5-and-10-cent store combine, whose reputation for low wages cries to heaven for vengeance. Let us see what the Woolworth Corporation has done throughout its history.

They were organized in the year 1911 with 500,000 shares of stock. In 1920 they gave a 30-percent stock dividend, 30 percent more to be placed upon the back of labor, making 650,000 shares. This was in 1920, and in 1924 they split this up 4 for 1, making 2,500,000 shares of stock. In 1927 they gave another dividend on top of that of 50 percent in stock, making 3,900,000 shares. In 1929 they again split that up 2½ for 1, making 9,750,000 shares, when only 500,000 shares were paid for as an investment in that business.

Now, what did the Government do to protect the workers and the consumers against this exploitation, against this need of squeezing the last drop of sweat and blood from the workers in this industry to pay dividends upon a fictitious capitalization?

Mr. Chairman, if you owned a piece of property you could not by the waving of a magic wand say, "Today I have a house worth $10,000, on which I am securing a just and equitable rent, and tomorrow, instead of one house at $10,000, I will create 10 houses at $10,000 each and expect to get a return on an investment of $100,000." This is what the corporations of the United States have done, and what has it profited the country? In the case of Woolworth the only contribution has been an heiress who has used American money to swap and trade European noblemen. This is the only contribution to our civilization that has been given this country by the Woolworth stock split-ups.

Now, there is another industry which, possibly, may be affected by a sit-down strike, the General Electric Corporation. Negotiations are under way at the present time with this corporation. Let us see what they did. In 1922 they gave stock dividends of special stock amounting to $8,717,000; in 1923, $8,984,375; in 1924, over $9,000,000 in special stock dividends; in 1925, $9,000,000 more of special stock dividends; and, again, in 1926, $7,200,000 worth of special stock dividends. In addition to this, between 1902 and 1921 they gave dividends of common stock amounting to approximately $83,000,000.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRADLEY. I yield.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that this same General Electric Corporation is headed by Mr. Swope, and Mr. Swope, before the Labor Committee, on the 30-hour-week bill, testified that the wage for American labor should be a bare existence wage—enough to keep body and soul together?

Mr. BRADLEY. I do not doubt that Mr. Swope would give such testimony, because that is in accord with the ideas which seem to permeate the minds of the captains of American industry generally.

Now, the General Electric Corporation, in addition to the operations of its own concerns, carried on a little financial transaction with respect to the Electric Bond & Share Corporation. This is a familiar name. You all know what they have done in the utility field. They were organized by the General Electric Corporation and they had originally 250,000 shares of stock, which, frankly, I think in the first instance was created only on paper, but they did not stop there. They distributed it and through slit-ups they have 5,267,000 shares of stock.

Mr. Chairman, every share of stock is a new burden on the back of the American worker.

Let us take the case of the United States Steel Corporation. In 1927 they declared a stock dividend of 40 percent—40 percent more to be ground out of the workers in that industry.

We are not confronted with a theory; we are confronted with facts, and it is debatable whether or not sit-down strikes are legal. After all, there are no honest property rights in operations of that sort, and the worker has a right to his job, a humane right that exceeds any right of property which in my estimation you can think of. [Applause.] Years ago we had another strike in this country. We had a strike in Homestead, in the steel industry, and the bayonet and the bullet were used to murder workers in cold blood. History does not record that Andrew Carnegie ever paid the penalty for that crime. I say to these men who cry for force, who denounce the sit-down striker, that, thank God, we have a President in the White House today and a Governor in the State of Michigan who will not permit the bayonet and the bullet to be used to shed the blood of workers who are simply striving to assert their rights and to call the attention of the Government to the exploitation which they have been the victims of for years and against which they have been defenseless. I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER].

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Chairman, it might seem perhaps necessary to apologize for addressing one's self to the subject which is now before the House, namely, the bill making appropriations for the District of Columbia. I join in what my colleague from Oklahoma [Mr. NICHOLS] has just said regarding the regrettable responsibility which seems to rest upon the committee concerned with the affairs of the District of Columbia. As will readily be recalled, in former years, most regrettable controversies have arisen in connection with the consideration of these matters—conflicts which inevitably resulted to the prejudice of the affairs of this great city of several hundred thousand, which is our very sacred trust. Perhaps there is no responsibility upon this Congress which should rest more intimately upon our consciences than the care of the District of Columbia, which, in every sense, is a beneficiary of our trust. The people of the District have no voice in their affairs. By the Constitution of the United States the sole responsibility for the proper government of what has become one of the great cities of the world rests upon this Congress, and in the orderly administration of their affairs it is certainly important that they should receive the consideration to which their magnitude and importance justly entitles them.

During the past 2 years I have served on the Committee on the District of Columbia, a responsibility that no one consciously invites, under the chairmanship of the distinguished gentlewoman from New Jersey [Mrs. NORTON].

It has been my observation that the Members designated for that responsibility on each side of the aisle have sought to carry out that trust in something of the sense in which it rests upon all of us here. We appreciate the extent to which the Members are involved in their own concerns, and we ask your consideration of what we here are trying to do.

I join with the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. NICHOLS] in the expression of regard for the labors of the chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations in charge of this bill now pending here. It is not necessary to challenge the good intentions or the wisdom of some of the provisions of this measure in order to recognize that it violates very definitely the well-considered and very salutary rules by which appropriations shall be made. The committee has very frankly recognized that there are incorporated in this bill at least 20 provisions which are of a legislative character, clearly forbidden by the rule. A casual reading of the bill will indicate that there are many other provisions to which objection should properly be made. If the House will recall the experiences of recent years, in respect to things concerned not merely with appropriations but with definite alterations in the legislative provisions governing the District of Columbia, they will recognize that there is here involved not only a "red rider" but a "pink rider" and a "brown rider" and some twenty other different kinds of "riders" that cover all the hues of the rainbow.

To what extent the Subcommittee on Appropriations was able to investigate all of the matters that are here involved, I have no knowledge, but certainly they will have been obliged to go far outside their field in order to hear the evidence and in order to arrive at any well-considered conclusion as to what might be wise. In such action they would be entirely usurping the functions of another committee constituted for this purpose. Certainly those of us on the Committee on the District of Columbia have no desire to assert ourselves or our authority, but we do conceive it to be our responsibility to bring this situation to the attention of the House in order that, as the years go by, it shall not be necessary to consult not merely the statutes but all of the appropriation bills that have been enacted to find out how many kinds of "riders" have affected our fundamental law. With this in view, I trust that the Chair and the House may give sympathetic consideration to the points of order which will be made. [Applause.]

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the lady from New Jersey [Mrs. NORTON].

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, nobody realizes more than does another chairman the problems and responsibilities confronting every committee chairman. Because this is true, it is with reluctance I have requested time from my distinguished friend [Mr. COLLINS] to explain to the House the necessity that compels the Committee on the District of Columbia to take exceptions to certain provisions in this appropriation bill. These exceptions are clearly legislative functions which have no place in an appropriation bill.

Before proceeding I wish to have it understood that no Member of the House has a more sincere regard for the chairman of the District of Columbia Appropriations Committee, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS], than I have. I believe he has had an unusually difficult task in writing this bill. However, as chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, I would be derelict in my duty to the committee and to the House if I did not challenge the legislative features proposed in this appropriation bill. In every case points of order which the committee proposes to make are concerned with changes in existing law. In order that there may be no misunderstanding we have submitted for the RECORD a list of points of order considered by the committee which, in their proper place, shall be submitted to the Chairman when the bill is being read for amendment. We do this in order to play fair with the appropriations subcommittee, and also that the House may have full knowledge of our position. We also wish it clearly understood that we are taking no position as to whether or not the changes in existing law are desirable. The point at issue is that we have our own function to perform. It is legislation for the District, while the Appropriations Committee allocates the funds necessary to carry on under existing law.

The other point is that a subcommittee has been appointed, as you have already been told, by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. NICHOLS] to examine the Jacobs' report. May I say in passing that this Jacobs' report has cost $50,000, and we really feel that it deserves some consideration, whether we agree with it or not. We contemplate that hearings will be held on this report concerning appropriate legislation, and if it is necessary to coordinate and consolidate District agencies, I am sure the committee appointed for that purpose will take care of the matter.

If the bill submitted to the House is sustained as written, with these legislative features included, it will again subject the House to the kind of disputes that have been going on during the past 2 years concerning the so-called "red rider" to the appropriation bill of 1936. I think you will all agree with me that we are very tired of that particular type of dispute. Every Member of the House practically conceded when a repeal bill was under consideration a few weeks ago that that rider should not have been on the appropriation bill, whether or not they approved the rider. Exactly the same question arises now. Are we to load down an otherwise good appropriation bill—and I say it is a good bill, for it is quite a generous bill for the District—and that is one of the reasons I do not want to see this bill loaded down with legislative enactments, because those enactments well may be considered, if they are accepted, as a precedent for future legislation. If the legislation provisions in this bill are sustained, it would seem that the functions of the Committee on the District of Columbia are no longer necessary. As I have already stated, I believe it to be my duty to call the attention of the House to this matter, in order that the privileges and powers of the legislative committee may not be usurped. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. AMLIE].

Mr. AMLIE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to talk to you about the relief situation in the District of Columbia. I am sure that Members of this House must realize that in the District of Columbia we have one of the worst situations to be found any place in the United States. The fact that we are the governing body of the District of Columbia places the responsibility for this situation squarely upon our shoulders. It is a responsibility that we cannot refuse to meet. I say that we individually, as legislators here, as members of the local board of aldermen, are responsible for the facts as they are here in the District of Columbia.

During the past 2 years the newspapers have from time to time carried accounts of cases of dire need. It is about a year ago, I think, that the Washington Star carried a series of those cases, citing the difficulties that those people were up against. During the past month or so the Washington Daily News has performed a similar service. I was struck just this morning in reading the opening paragraph of an article in the Washington Post:

> A woman, "employable", with four little children huddled in one room without food; an aged couple, also dubbed "employable", moving in with a young son who has a wife and baby to support also from his $16 a week; a father, mother, and two children living in one room and sleeping in one bed; these were a few of the actual cases described at yesterday's meeting of the committee on the citizens' mass meeting in behalf of the unemployed.

I venture to assert that a person need only walk down Pennsylvania Avenue from the Capitol to the White House to be accosted by more destitute, down-and-out people than he would be along any street in any city of comparable size in the United States; and yet this condition exists in the District of Columbia where we, the Federal Congress, are the governing body. That is the record that we, as the board of aldermen of this city, have made in discharging our duties.

I want to recount briefly some of the pertinent facts in regard to the needs of the unemployed in Washington. It seems to me that a mere statement of these needs constitutes the severest indictment that could be made against us individually as Members of Congress.

The following statement regarding the needs of the unemployed people in Washington is vouched for by the secretary of the Family Service Association of the District of Columbia:

1. Last spring 4,000 cases were dropped from public relief in Washington because of insufficient appropriations.

2. Under the necessity of keeping within the budget, the Board of Public Welfare decided to drop all cases where there was some "employable" member in the family.

3. Need for relief in these families was well known to the Board of Public Welfare. It provided this relief as long as it had funds with which to do so.

4. Intense suffering and family deterioration resulted at the time these families were dropped, and has become increasingly worse ever since, as indicated by the more than doubling of applications to the private relief agencies, the increased number of evictions reported to them, the increased number of desertions, the reports of overcrowding where from 8 to 13 persons are living in 1 or 2 rooms, and by repeated stories of the poorest being cared for by the next poorest.

5. On January 5, 1937, representatives of 28 social welfare and civic agencies appeared before the District Commissioners urging that the Commissioners request a deficiency appropriation to meet the relief needs. Nothing happened, and the Commissioners later said frankly that they had been told informally by a member of the Federal Budget Bureau that such a request would not be passed on by the Budget Bureau to Congress.

6. During January 1,447, during February 1,435 applications, and during March 1,559 applications were made to the public relief agency by families in which there were one or more employable members. Fully half of these applied also to the private relief agencies, but it was possible for these agencies to help only a few cases in these 2 months.

7. These applications were not even investigated as to need because (a) the public agency did not have sufficient staff to make the investigations and (b) it had no funds to help employables no matter how desperate the verified need.

8. Other cities comparable in size to Washington accept responsibility for relief to "employables"; for example, in December Boston gave relief from local public funds to 10,848 "employable" families which were wholly unemployed or underemployed. (This was approximately 14 such families per 1,000 of the population.) In Cincinnati 8,124 such families (or 18 per 1,000 population) and in Cleveland 17,867 such families (or 19 per 1,000 population) were given public relief; while in Washington public relief was not available to one such family no matter how desperate the need.

9. Whereas in Washington in December there were 10,640 persons on W. P. A. jobs—that is, work-relief jobs provided through Federal funds—in Boston there were 23,488, in Cincinnati 14,164, and in Cleveland 32,266.

10. The public-relief agency certified those eligible for W. P. A. jobs. The number thus certified has been sufficient to maintain an unassigned W. P. A. waiting list averaging about 1,125.

11. Of the 11,989 persons on W. P. A. jobs under District and Federal auspices, 10,337 are employed because their need for relief has been established through the Public Assistance Division. The remaining 1,652 are employed in technical capacities to direct the projects. Of the 10,337 employed because of need, 85 percent are unskilled laborers and receive only $48 per month, regardless of the size of their families.

12. The Public Employment Center has active registrations of approximately 14,000 unemployed persons seeking jobs besides the 11,989 on W. P. A. jobs who are also registered there.

13. From among the wholly unemployed and the W. P. A. workers earning only $48 a month, from 1,500 to 2,000 have to apply each month to the relief agencies for assistance.

14. From January 1, 1937, through March 20 the Public Employment Center has placed in private industry 2,608 individuals in "regular" jobs lasting 30 days or more and 2,774 in "temporary" jobs lasting less than 30 days. During this period 7,260 new applications were received at the center.

15. Recent registrants are more likely to be referred to jobs by the Public Employment Center than the unemployed who have long been out of work. They are more likely to give employer satisfaction because they have been able to maintain their work habits.

16. It is often said that persons on relief in Washington are recent arrivals here. No one is given public relief and practically no one private relief who has not been a resident of the District for the past year. Newcomers requesting relief are returned to their place of legal residence either by the Transient Division of the Public Agency or by the Travelers' Aid Society.

17. A study made before "employables" were dropped from the relief rolls showed that 85 percent of the families on relief had been residents of the District 5 years or more.

I have given this summary because I want the facts to appear in the RECORD. I want it to show the exact need that exists here, a need that we as the members of the board of aldermen for the District of Columbia are failing to meet.

Not long ago I was told that an effort was made to persuade a certain gentleman who holds a highly responsible position in the Federal Government to recommend that the sum of $300,000 be included in the deficiency appropriation bill to provide in some degree for the employables here in the District of Columbia who are in need of relief and for whom nothing is done. This gentleman stated that he would not recommend the inclusion of this amount for this purpose, but that he would be happy to recommend the inclusion of this amount if it were to be used for the purchase of cyanide of potassium to be fed to these unfortunates.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. AMLIE. I suppose Marie Antoinette, when she suggested that the hungry mobs crying for bread might eat cake did so in good faith. The poor woman, living in the luxury to which she was accustomed, simply could not conceive of people being so destitute that they had nothing at all to eat, and her suggestion that they forego their insistence upon bread and eat cake did not seem at all unreasonable. This woman has gone down in history as a bad woman, not because she had a bad heart, but because she was wholly unaware of the needs of her people. Now it happens that this individual, in a high official position, has made a statement that constitutes an equally interesting commentary on the attitude of a democratic government toward a part of its citizens in the year of our Lord 1937. Personally, I am glad that he put it in those blunt terms. He no doubt meant it as irony, but he was justifying a policy that we as Members of Congress have established for the District of Columbia.

If we decide upon an inhumane policy, a policy that decrees that there shall be no relief here for employable people, no matter how numerous or how destitute they may be, it stands to reason that we are going to get men to administer our policies who believe that the policy is justified and who, in expressing that conviction, are sometimes brutally frank. The gentleman is not speaking for himself; he is speaking for the Seventy-fifth Congress; and we, as Members of this body, will go down in history as the people who decided on the policy that, put in ironic terms, it was better to use public funds to buy poison to get rid of these surplus people than to take care of them.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AMLIE. I yield.

Mr. COLLINS. Would the gentleman mind divulging the name of the person who made that statement?

Mr. AMLIE. I have, of course, divulged his name to the chairman of the subcommittee. I feel, very frankly, that it is not necessary to divulge it here, for I have nothing against this individual. It seems to me that he is merely speaking in justification of a policy for which we, as Members of Congress, are responsible.

Mr. COLLINS. Frankly, if the gentleman from Wisconsin gave me this man's name, I do not remember it.

Mr. AMLIE. I shall be glad to give his name to the gentleman again when I have concluded my remarks.

I know the argument is used here, in discussing relief, that if we give relief it will simply mean that two people will come in from other parts of the country for every one to whom we give relief, and that the demand for relief will be that much greater. I suppose that 2 out of 3 of these 12,000 people who are registered at the employment center, employables looking for work, are colored; still they are here, and 85 percent of them have been here for more than 5 years. It seems to me that our failure to meet this responsibility is a commentary on the fact that we have failed altogether in meeting the problem throughout the country as a whole.

I wish to illustrate what I mean. I have received a copy of a publication put out by the Works Progress Administration, entitled "Unemployment and Increasing Productivity", written by David Weintraub and Harold L. Posner. This report contains some of the most significant material I have ever seen in print.

For instance, at the present time, of the available supply of labor in the country, 41 percent is not utilized. That is, there is today proportionately nine times as much unemployment as there was back in 1920. The fact that 41 percent of our potential man-years of labor are not utilized is in itself an indictment not only of the social and economic system under which we live but of ourselves as Members of Congress in failing to initiate a plan of any kind that will make use of the labor of these people, which labor is now going to waste.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. AMLIE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to comment briefly on the question of relief.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AMLIE. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I wish the gentleman would enlarge just a little bit on that 41 percent which he mentions. I did not get it clearly in my mind.

Mr. AMLIE. I will put it this way: This is a study in which the people in charge of research have tried to make a sum total of all available labor each year in this country from the year 1920 through 1935.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Take, for instance, the year 1936. What is the number of persons available for labor?

Mr. AMLIE. This study does not translate it into such terms.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Well, assume we had 50,000,000 available for labor, does that mean 41 percent cannot find work or are out of work?

Mr. AMLIE. Yes; that would be the fact, only I wish to qualify it in this way. Many may be working part time; they may be working 2 or 3 months out of the year, and this study has attempted to figure out the total man-years of labor available and the total man-years of labor unused.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Or unused hours or days and it amounts to 41 percent?

Mr. AMLIE. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Where did the gentleman get that statement?

Mr. AMLIE. This is a study by the Works Progress Administration entitled "Unemployment and Increased Productivity", prepared by the National Resources Committee.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Has that increase been progressive since 1920 or has it diminished?

Mr. AMLIE. In 1920 the percentage of unemployed man-years was at its low point. It increased considerably through 1921. It went back to about normal in 1923. It continued at that rate until 1929. It reached a high point in 1933 of 47 percent. It has gone down from 47 in 1933 to 41 percent in 1935. The figures are not given for later than 1935. I shall be very happy to lend this to the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, I want to review briefly the problem of relief as it has appealed to me as a Member of Congress. I was a Member of Congress in 1932 as well as in the spring of 1933. Of course, the policy of the Federal Government then was to do nothing about the problem except lend money to local municipalities and States where the local credit had broken down altogether. With the coming of the New Deal we had relief set up in the form of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration. This worked out as an emergency measure in a reasonably satisfactory manner.

By September 1934 relief had reached an average of about $30 a month per family throughout the United States. Public opinion then began to turn against the maintenance of people in idleness. Then the amount began to go down until it reached about $25 a month in January of 1935.

At that time the administration set up the Works Progress Administration on the theory that the public would support these people if they were working at jobs of some kind. That has worked out reasonably well, but today there is a growing resentment against what people term "boondoggling", that is, keeping people working on projects that are not particularly useful from a social standpoint, or, if they do have any use from a social standpoint, they do not, in the opinion of the people, represent the most efficient use that could be made of this labor. That is the situation we are facing today. Public opinion is not supporting the Works Progress Administration in the way it should; still we are faced with the fact that approximately 41 percent of our potential man-years are not utilized. We are falling down, as I see it, in failing to establish a system whereby these unemployed might contribute their own labor toward their own support.

Because conditions are so bad in the rest of the country, if we give a little relief here in the District of Columbia, the fear is expressed that people from adjoining States, particularly the colored people, will pile in here. I concede that that may be true, but I do not think it is any defense so far as we are concerned, because we are not only the governing body of the District of Columbia but also the Congress of the United States.

The situation as I see it merely reflects our own failure to solve this problem of unemployment. If conditions are so bad in other parts of the country, particularly the South, that if we give any relief here the whole of the unemployed South will move into the District of Columbia, it seems to me that in itself is a terrific indictment of our failure as representatives of the American people.

I sincerely hope we will not let this appropriation bill pass without making some provision for the care of the destitute employables in the District of Columbia. As the bill now stands, no provision at all is made for employable people who may be in need. There are employable people who are in need in all parts of the country, and we have them in the District of Columbia. It is not fair to say, "If you don't like it here, go back to the State from which you came", because 85 percent of these people have been living here for more than 5 years. They would be regarded as transients if they attempted to go back to the States where they were born. There is no relief there anyway, so what purpose would there be in their going back to some other community where relief is also practically nonexistent?

In conclusion may I say that if we as Members of Congress, in discharging our duties as the governing body of the District of Columbia, fail to include provision of any kind for the destitute employable people in the District, I sincerely hope the American people in righteous indignation and decency will rise up and retire each and every one of us from this deliberative body.

I yield back the balance of my time. [No applause.]

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHORT].

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, on the great seal of my native State of Missouri you will find the Latin inscription "Salus populi suprema lex esto", meaning that the safety of the people is the supreme law. Without obedience to law there can be no liberty in this or in any other country. Every game, every sport, every business, every government, every organization of any kind must have certain rules and regulations by which they must be governed. Unless these rules are strictly adhered to and faithfully obeyed, the result is anarchy.

Today the peace of our country and the happiness, the lives, and the property of American citizens are threatened and placed in jeopardy by sit-down strikes. A few minutes ago the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRADLEY] attempted to justify sit-down strikes. I listened attentively to his remarks, and, though he damned and condemned in wholesale manner certain abuses and wrongs of corporations and captains of industry, I failed to find one logical reason advanced by him which would excuse or justify these sit-down strikes, which are nothing more than unlawful trespass by men marching in and taking possession of other people's property and refusing to move or yield until their demands are met. There is no justification in law, precedent, or morals for them.

Mr. Chairman, I hold no brief for the wrongs committed in bygone days by great corporations. I certainly do not condone the unethical and illegal practices of certain captains of industry. Having had to work all my life, starting first by shining shoes and selling papers, and later by driving jennies to a cart to earn my own living, if I had any predilections or sympathies they would naturally be with the laboring man.

However, the fact that corporations and captains of industry in ages past have been guilty of wrongdoing, the fact they have perpetrated wrongs is no excuse or justification for employees or laboring men to perpetrate similar wrongs. Two wrongs will never make a right.

I think every Member of this House and the American people at large should feel profoundly indebted to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES], who on the 23d of this month delivered such a splendid speech on this subject, clear, concise, comprehensive, and convincing. The logic he advanced in that address is absolutely unanswerable. It is all the more convincing, because the distinguished gentleman from Texas has for many years been a loyal and consistent friend of labor. However, he realizes, as do many of us in this Chamber whose hearts beat in sympathy with the men and women who earn their living by the sweat of their brows, that many of them today are being misguided and led astray by professional labor racketeers, who are doing labor greater harm than has ever been done by any captain of industry or any corporation.

I have received communications from friends of mine in Michigan. Recently I have spoken in Pontiac and Kalamazoo. I think I know somewhat the feeling not only of the citizens of the great Wolverine State but of the laborers in the factories themselves. I have been reliably informed, both through correspondence and by conversation face to face with men who have worked in the factories, that the overwhelming percentage of employees has bitterly opposed from the very beginning these unlawful and unethical sit-down strikes, which have deprived the great mass of laborers the opportunity to work.

If an employee can march into the factories of a great industry and take possession of the property of his employer, what is there in the name of reason and common sense to prevent an employer from marching into the home of his employee and sitting down there and refusing to move until his demands are granted? If those who work for an employer can march into his place of business or his factory, sit down, and refuse to budge until their demands are met, what is there to prevent the servants in your own households from sitting down and refusing to allow you to employ anyone else, however anxious these others might be to secure employment by working for you? Carried to its logical conclusion, no good can come from this action on the part of certain leaders of labor.

I have always been old-fashioned enough to believe it is much better to "git up and get" than it is to "sit down and set." The only animal I know which can sit and still produce dividends is the old hen.

The minimum wage paid for common sweepers and wipers, unskilled workers in the factories of General Motors in Michigan, was 65 cents an hour, with time and a half for overtime, which was wholly optional with the employees. One friend of mine who has worked for the past 5 years in the factories of General Motors wrote me several weeks ago that last December, working only 23 days, he had received a check for more than $320; that he was perfectly satisfied with the conditions, the hours of labor, and the price paid for that labor, yet he was prevented, along with perhaps 75,000 other workers, by about 20 percent of the total number of employees, from going to work and earning a decent, honest, and lawful livelihood for his family.

Mr. Chairman, I was amazed a week ago Saturday to read in the press that the distinguished majority leader of the Senate, Mr. ROBINSON, reported to the press immediately after a conference with the President on his recent return from Georgia to the White House that the President of the United States was "powerless" to act in this crisis—that he had no authority to take a decided stand.

This statement reveals either profound ignorance of the law or else a sheer statement of pure unadulterated political bunk; and I cannot believe the Senator is ignorant of the law.

I want to ask your indulgence to take the time to listen to section 5299 of the Revised Statutes of the United States:

SEC. 5299. Whenever insurrection, domestic violence, unlawful combinations, or conspiracies in any State so obstructs or hinders the execution of the laws thereof, and of the United States, as to deprive any portion or class of the people of such State of any of the rights, privileges, or immunities, or protection named in the Constitution and secured by the laws for the protection of such rights, privileges, or immunities, and the constituted authorities of such State are unable to protect, or, from any cause, fail in or refuse protection of the people in such rights, such facts shall be deemed a denial by such State of the equal protection of the laws to which they are entitled under the Constitution of the United States; and in all such cases, or whenever any such insurrection, violence, unlawful combination, or conspiracy opposes or obstructs the laws of the United States, or the due execution thereof, or impedes or obstructs the due course of justice, it shall be lawful for the President, and it shall be his duty, to take such measures, by the employment of the militia or the land and naval forces of the United States, or of either, or by other means, as he may deem necessary, for the suppression of such insurrection, domestic violence, or combinations.

So, Mr. Chairman, I submit to you and the Members in this Chamber that this code not only gives the President the authority and the power to act but it also imposes upon him the sacred and solemn duty to act in order to protect any portion of the American people, be they employers or employees, in their rights, privileges, and immunities as citizens of the United States.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania a moment ago said he thanked God we had a Governor in Michigan and a man in the White House who would not allow armed forces to go in and eject the sit-down strikers. I agree with the gentleman. I think we all will agree. No one wants to see bloodshed in this country. No one wants to see violence, but I pause to ask you, Who is starting and instigating this unlawful violence? Grover Cleveland, in 1894, during the great railway strikes in Chicago, sent the armed forces of the United States into that territory and they ended the disputes and prevented the spread of anarchy and lawlessness throughout this country. It seems to me it is the clear obligation and the unmistakable duty of the President of the United States, under the provision which was enacted by this Congress, to take a firm and decided stand in this controversy. It may be bad to employ a little force now, but it is much better to spill a little blood than to coddle and encourage open violence and rebellion that will ultimately and eventually end in the spilling of much blood.

What justification is there for the President of the United States to ignore, to pussyfoot, to evade the duty that is clearly placed upon him? I read a clipping a few minutes ago from a Grand Rapids, Mich., newspaper stating that Governor Murphy day before yesterday, in Pontiac, said that the President often called him—morning, noon, and night; three times a day—keeping in close contact with the trouble in Michigan. Why is it that he, by his silent acquiescence in this unlawful trespass—why is it, I ask you, that he condones the sit-down strike? Why is it by his silence he is giving encouragement to workers throughout every State of this Union to follow the suit and the trump cards played by Mr. Lewis and his followers? I do not know why it is; but we all know that John L. Lewis raised more than $400,000 from the United Mine Workers alone for President Roosevelt's campaign fund last November. I do not know whether Mr. Lewis and Mr. Roosevelt had a secret deal or not, but evidently they did have, for I do know that John L. Lewis has openly and vehemently defied court orders in the State of Michigan, which was once a State of law and order but which is fast and rapidly becoming a State of anarchy. I do know, Mr. Chairman, he defied not only court orders but he defied the Governor of Michigan as well as the President of the United States.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHORT. In just a moment, I shall be pleased to yield.

Where are we going? What will be the end and ultimate outcome? There is no graver question confronting the American people or confronting this Congress than this very question that has been discussed here today.

Then, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that if the Governor of Michigan had a bone instead of a rubber band for a spine, if he had acted with the same firm, courageous, and fearless determination that the Governor of New Jersey and the Governor of Connecticut employed, we would not today be forced to rise here, many of us against our will, not as an enemy but as a friend of labor itself, to point out the hidden danger and to warn them of the unfortunate and ultimate outcome.

I would be presumptuous, Mr. Chairman, to attempt to add anything else to what the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] has already discussed in such a comprehensive, such a reasonable, such a logical, and such an unanswerable manner. I only hope that the Members of this body who did not read that speech, as well as the American people generally, will get a copy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 23 and read every line of it, and that they will also get the RECORD of yesterday and read every line of one of the most masterful addresses ever delivered by an American statesman in any age, namely, the radio address of the distinguished and patriotic American, the senior Senator from Virginia, CARTER GLASS.

I now yield with pleasure to my friend from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has stated that two wrongs do not make a right. The gentleman agrees that General Motors and various corporations to which I referred in my statement have perpetrated injustices in connection with their capital structure and the pyramiding of stocks. The gentleman stated he agrees that this is wrong.

Mr. SHORT. I did not designate General Motors.

Mr. BRADLEY. Many corporations. I will ask the gentleman this question: Taking for granted that he condemns these practices and admits that labor has been thereby exploited, as a Member of this House, when these evils were being perpetrated, did the gentleman introduce any legislation to correct such abuses and prevent the exploitation of labor?

Mr. SHORT. I will say to the gentleman that I had the endorsement of the American Federation of Labor at the last election in November, and I won——

Mr. BRADLEY. The gentleman does not answer my question.

Mr. SHORT. And I won my election in spite of that endorsement, and half of them voted against me.

Mr. BRADLEY. Has the gentleman ever introduced any legislation designed to prevent the split-up of stocks and the issuance of paper capital?

Mr. SHORT. Oh, the gentleman's statement is an argument reductio ad absurdum. I am not a member of the Committee on Labor. Of course, I have not introduced such legislation.

Mr. BRADLEY. But the gentleman is a Member of this House. The gentleman says that he has stood by labor, and now when labor seeks to adjust its difficulties by a method which has not yet been declared illegal the gentleman champions the cause of the General Motors Co. and their hired thugs. The gentleman said that he is a friend of labor. God save the mark! [Applause.]

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is just about as wild-eyed as he is. He says that I have not supported labor. He cannot point to one instance in which I have not done so. He pictures me as a friend of the General Motors, but he cannot point to one single evidence of any action on my part in this House where I have shown any particular friendship for General Motors, and in the absence of logic and reason he spews forth pious platitudes and glittering generalities.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRISWOLD].

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHORT] started his statement with a Latin quotation from the coat of arms of the State of Missouri. There is another quotation on the coat of arms of the State of Missouri that is in the Anglo-Saxon language, which does not need to be translated, a quotation that surrounds the two bears on the coat of arms which says, "United we stand, divided we fall."

I am a member of the Committee on Labor. I realize from his argument that probably the gentleman is opposed to sit-down strikes, as I am, but I do not see where the gentleman is going to get any place in attacking the sit-down strikers and defending the industrialists in this matter. The Committee on Labor did 4 years ago try to do something about the matter. Let us get at the facts. Mr. Swope of the General Electric and Mr. Sloan of the General Motors both appeared before the Committee on Labor and consumed many hours in their testimony in favor of the so-called Swope plan for minimum hours and minimum wages. Mr. Swope in that testimony, if the gentleman would care to read the record, said that the minimum wage for American labor should be a bare existence, enough to keep body and soul together, and he will find, further, that when Mr. Sloan of the General Motors testified before that committee, when asked if he agreed with Mr. Swope's testimony that the wages for American labor should be merely enough to keep body and soul together, testified that he agreed with Mr. Swope's statement on that matter.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRISWOLD. Yes.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRISWOLD] in not agreeing with those gentlemen in that statement.

Mr. GRISWOLD. If we are going to get at the real situation, we should look deeper than just the surface.

Mr. EATON rose.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I shall yield later. This year we are going to celebrate the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the adoption of the Constitution. That instrument begins with three words in capital letters—We, the People. That comprehends all of us, not labor and industrialists alone, but you and me, the doctors, the lawyers, the butchers, the candlestick makers, and everyone else. We come here and attack the sit-down strikers or we attack the industrialists and neither attack benefits the whole of the people. We must reach a place where we can get together on this thing, where we can work out something that will protect the rest of us and not merely capital and labor.

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRISWOLD. Yes.

Mr. EATON. I am surprised at the gentleman's statement with respect to the position of Mr. Swope, and unless I saw that in actual words, I would not believe it, because Mr. Swope's whole position and purpose is to steadily increase the wage of the worker and improve his condition. I shall give the gentleman one illustration. In the incandescent lamp department of the General Electric Co. during the entire depression every worker had 98 percent of his possible hours of employment under the code, and every worker was guaranteed 66⅔ percent of his annual income whether he worked or not. The entire General Electric labor set-up is far removed from any such uneconomic and inhuman proposal as a mere subsistence wage. The average wage in the General Electric last year for 61,000 employees was nearly $1,800, including men and women.

Mr. GRISWOLD. If the gentleman will get the hearings before the Labor Committee on the 30-hour week in the Seventy-second Congress, he may read the statement of Mr. Swope and find it just as I have told him it is. I go further and tell the gentleman about Mr. Swope's attitude on labor in those hearings. Let the gentleman read them. If he cannot get a copy from the document room, I shall be very glad to lend him mine.

I am glad to have the gentleman say that the average wage for 61,000 employees is $1,800, including men and women. I only hope he is correct. No one who read Mr. Swope's testimony in the hearings could stretch his imagination to believe it from that statement. Certainly the testimony shows that they were not paying it then. And the testimony does show that the General Electric was manufacturing incandescent-lamp bulbs in its own factory in Japan with cheap Japanese labor and shipping those bulbs into the United States and selling them in competition with bulbs made by American labor in the factories of General Electric in this country. I most sincerely suggest that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. EATON] read the hearings. They should prove novel and interesting to him. Among other things he would learn what Mr. Swope himself said.

Mr. Swope, in that same hearing in which he was testifying concerning the so-called Swope plan, desired to fix not a minimum work week but a minimum work year. He wanted it so that he could allow employees a certain number of hours a year and then work all of those hours in 6 months out of the year, if he so desired, leaving those same employees during the other 6 months of the year to be without employment. You will find this argument in the hearings. The question was asked Mr. Swope if he worked these people at a bare existence wage for a part of the year, giving them only enough under this bare-existence wage to pay their grocery bills, their rent bill, and to purchase the bare necessities, what would happen in the other months when they were not working? Mr. Swope did not answer the question other than to infer that they would be on the public, on charity.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRISWOLD. I decline to yield further. I am going to answer the gentleman and he can find what I am telling him in the hearings. Mr. Swope used this argument, that they also were taxpayers in these communities, and paid their proportionate share for taking care of unemployed.

But all this is beside the question. I am not anxious to attack these industrialists on their attitude. Neither am I anxious to attack the sit-down strikers. I do not believe in sit-down strikes. I am opposed to them, but I do not believe in industrialists paying their employees a bare existence wage for 6 months of the year and leaving them on the public for the other 6 months. I believe that industrialists who take their profits from labor in times of prosperity should take care of labor in times of depression, and not leave labor at billions of dollars of expense on the general public.

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRISWOLD. I yield.

Mr. MILLARD. Does the gentleman from Indiana know that Gerard Swope belongs to your party and is a close friend of the President?

Mr. EATON. And is a close adviser of the President on industrial matters.

Mr. MILLARD. Does the gentleman know that?

Mr. GRISWOLD. No; I do not know that.

Mr. MILLARD. That is true. He lives in my district, and he is a fine man.

Mr. GRISWOLD. But it is beside the question whether he is a friend of the President or belongs to my party, in settling this difficulty.

Mr. MILLARD. I thought you ought to know that.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I will say further that I do know the President appointed Mr. Swope as head of a code authority under the N. R. A. and that the electric code had about the longest work-week of any industry.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRISWOLD. I yield.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHORT] stated that the United Mine Workers of America had contributed $400,000 to the President's campaign and that evidently Mr. Lewis expected a favor from the President. I wonder if the gentleman can tell us how much the Liberty Leaguers, the industrial royalists, and the Du Ponts contributed to the Republican campaign fund and what they expected to receive from Mr. Landon had he been elected?

Mr. SHORT. I would like to answer that question.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Just a moment. I have the floor. The gentleman from Missouri may answer it in his own time.

I would like to say to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOUSTON] that I do not believe even the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHORT], with his great intellect, has enough mathematics to figure out just how much they gave.

Mr. SACKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for an observation?

Mr. GRISWOLD. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SACKS. Does the gentleman know that when there were certain strikes in the State of Pennsylvania the employer complained because the strikers, who were fighting for a living wage, were put on public relief, and objected to the Government taking care of those people during the strike, and yet at the same time saying he had a right to bring in scabs who were against the "sit-downers"?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRISWOLD. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman from Indiana is a labor leader. He is a railroad labor leader primarily. There is no more conscientious, no more effective labor leader in Congress than the gentleman from Indiana. He is always fair. I came in just as he was addressing the committee. I think I understand his philosophy. I think I understand and can go along with him 9 times out of 10 toward the objective which he seeks. I do not want to misunderstand him, and I do not want the House to misunderstand him. Do I understand that he is in any way defending the sit-down strikes?

Mr. GRISWOLD. Answering that very briefly, I am not.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRISWOLD. I yield.

Mr. SHORT. I realize that the gentleman is not, and that he does not condone wrongdoing any more by employees than by employers. So it seems to me we are in fundamental agreement.

Mr. GRISWOLD. We are, except to this extent, that the gentleman from Missouri takes the floor and attacks sit-down strikers.

Mr. SHORT. Should they not be attacked?

Mr. GRISWOLD. He takes the floor and defends industrialists.

Then he attacks the President for not interfering with States' rights in these matters. He attacks him for letting the members of these various States take care of themselves.

Mr. SHORT. Oh; but a Federal statute imposes upon the President the duty to interfere when the State fails to interfere.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Just a moment. What I am suggesting is that the gentleman is wrong in either attacking the sit-down strikers or defending the industrialists in trying to settle this question. His attacking either side will not settle it.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. GRISWOLD. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. The thing that he could criticize about the sit-down strikes in Michigan is the attitude of the Governor of Michigan in sending troops to Flint with instructions to see that the sit-downers were not molested in their unlawful method of striking. The fact that the lieutenant governor went to Flint and assured the strikers that they would be protected in their unlawful occupation was most unfortunate. Governor Murphy is the friend of those strikers, and one word from him would have avoided the unfortunate revolutionary state in Michigan today. The Governor will learn that he cannot play with fire, even though there is favorable publicity involved. The fire may get beyond control before it has reached the most spectacular stage. A firm word from the Governor at the time of the General Motors strike would have had the same effect that it did have when the Chrysler strikers moved out. Strikes should be settled by negotiation, and the gentleman from Indiana and myself believe they should negotiate. The merits of the controversy are not involved when insurrection is involved.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I may say to the gentleman that I being a citizen of the State of Indiana, far be it from me to comment on the alleged derelictions of the officials of the State of Michigan; but if we really want to do something in settling this sit-down strike situation, and this whole situation, let us cease to be partisan on one side or the other, let us get together as representatives of all the people, let us pass bills and see that they stick, bills like the Wagner labor-disputes bill, that gives both a chance to go in and bargain about these matters, settle them, and also take into consideration the general public, not just labor and the industrialists. There is more to it than just these two classes. It is the general public that bears the brunt of this thing. It is the general public that suffers through increased taxation. Any strike, I do not care whether it is a sit-down strike or what kind of a strike it is, any strike, even if you win it, is a national calamity; and I have been in some of them.

If I could plead with this House, I would plead with you not to go out and attack the attitude of the President, who I personally believe is perfectly right and proper and just in his failure to go in and interfere with the State of Michigan, but I would plead with you to get some kind of legislation through here that would really settle the matter. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHORT] referred to a statute that has no application to this case. I think it is a statute that has been held unconstitutional. I may be mistaken. I have not had time to investigate. But even if valid, it does not apply. It would only apply in cases of rebellion or when law had completely broken down.

There is no rebellion in Michigan—merely a dispute between labor and the employer. I refuse to believe that the people of the great State of Michigan are insurrectionists. I do not condemn a whole State because some citizens do wrong. If the officials of Michigan make mistakes, then, let the people of Michigan correct the error, not the President of the United States.

As to whether the law has broken down is a question of fact to be determined as any other question of fact. I do not believe, on the face of the evidence he has, that the President could say the law has broken down. I think the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHORT] would be one of the first to resent it if the President did say that.

The gentleman refers with high praise to Grover Cleveland and the Pullman strike. That case was different. Cleveland ordered Federal troops out in that strike because the operation of United States mail was interfered with, and the Republican Party, of which the gentleman is a member, used that fact as political material against President Cleveland.

This is a union of States in which, as the Missouri coat of arms states, "United we stand, divided we fall." Let us not divide between the industrialists and labor. Let us stand united in the interest of all the people. Cease foolish attacks and defenses and try to work this out logically and constructively.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHURCH].

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to read from three or four paragraphs of a court decision of last Tuesday.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to be permitted to read three or four paragraphs from the court decision of last Tuesday. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to include in my remarks an agreement filed in the office of the recorder of Cook County, Ill., and some quotations from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD which I desire to discuss.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, to what agreement does the gentleman refer?

Mr. CHURCH. It is an agreement by Mr. Tupy that I discussed last week, filed in the office of the recorder of deeds of Cook County, Chicago.

I desire to discuss a few paragraphs of it and wish to refer to the exact words of the agreement.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Who is Mr. Tupy?

Mr. CHURCH. He is the man that was involved in this Bondholders' Select Committee matter. It is a matter I discussed the other day.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. The gentleman might include under that sort of a request any agreement Mr. Tupy may have made.

Mr. CHURCH. I do not believe the gentleman should deny me the right to read part of an agreement of record. I shall try to be as brief as possible.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Has the gentleman called the attention of this request to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH]?

Mr. CHURCH. Have I?

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Yes.

Mr. CHURCH. I sent word to my office that he be notified. I am on the floor all the time myself and expect other Members to be.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Chairman, for the moment I object.

Mr. CHURCH. I wish the gentleman would not object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair may say that permission for the inclusion of any extraneous matter would have to be granted by the House itself and not by the Committee.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to read certain parts of this agreement.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Chairman, for the moment I object. I would like to see it.

Mr. CHURCH. Then I will delay the request until I get to that portion of my talk. I may say for the information of the gentleman from New York, I am anxious that the whole membership of that select committee be on the floor.

Mr. Chairman, the remarks of the chairman of the select committee last Monday (March 29) on the floor of the House are of such a nature that they cannot be permitted to remain unanswered. When I addressed you last Thursday (March 25) with reference to the activities of the chairman of the select committee and certain of its representatives, I made certain statements of fact. I made assertions and I demanded full disclosure of the facts. Ladies and gentlemen, I stand by those statements.

I demand those disclosures now. What I said last Thursday to the chairman of the select committee, I again repeat. "These questions must be answered not by abusing some individual, bondholders' committee, or trustee but specifically, and the facts clearly and concisely set forth." What were these questions? What are the disclosures that I called for?

They are: First. How many letters soliciting the deposit of bonds were sent out by this select committee? Second. How many bonds were deposited pursuant to these letters? Third. To what attorneys were they referred? What did these attorneys do in each particular case? What fees did they charge, and did our select committee in any way supervise or keep track of the actions of these attorneys?

Those are the questions that I asked. Why did I ask them? Because the chairman of the select committee represented to the Subcommittee of the House Judiciary Committee that these forty-odd attorneys were "holier than thou", and were giving their services gratis to the committee. He made that statement on March 6, 1936, when he knew perfectly well that on January 17, 1936, one of those attorneys had petitioned in a Federal court for a fee of $25,000 for his services as representative of the select committee before that court. That's why I asked for these facts. We, as Members of this House, are certainly entitled to know the truth about the activities of our committee. If everything is hunky-dory and aboveboard, no one need fear the truth. I have not impugned the honesty and integrity of anyone. All that I have asked for are the facts and, believe me, the setting up and knocking down of straw men is not going to deter me from getting the facts.

I said on Thursday that I had a photostatic copy of a letter sent out under the name of the chairman of the select committee soliciting the deposit of bonds so that they might be turned over to some attorney who would be paid a "contingent fee." I quote from that letter already in the record:

If you desire to share in any benefits which may develop, we ask you to sign enclosed authority so that an accredited attorney can be assigned to start proceedings. It is intended that this matter will cost you nothing unless recovery of some sort is obtained for you; in that case the attorney, and necessary accountants, handling the matter will expect to be paid on a contingent basis.

What did the chairman of the select committee have to say about that? Why, he confined his answer to what he termed "that letter", and introduced into the record a letter sent out on April 12, 1935, to Mr. Charles Lefevre. I am not interested in finding out about that one letter alone. I know there were others sent because the letter I referred to was sent not to Mr. Lefevre but to another person.

The chairman says that he stopped the practice by telephone as soon as he heard about it. I accept that statement. But how long had it been going on before he found out? That question is easily answered. Mr. Tupy is right here in Washington, and sat in the gallery while members of the select committee spoke last Monday and Tuesday. Let the chairman ask him. It is only a simple thing to do.

Speaking about these attorneys, I said on Thursday that one of them, Newell Mecartney, had asked for a fee of $25,000, and I read to you from his sworn petition wherein he stated that he appeared as attorney for the select committee, and because of his services as such representative he was entitled to a fee of $25,000.

What did the chairman of the select committee on Monday have to say about that? Did he deny it? No; of course not. Why he even knew that the petition was being filed for says he, "We knew, and everyone else knew, that the fee would not be allowed." How did he know that? Was it because he knew that Mecartney's charges were, as the special master found, "fantastic." Yet he upholds this conduct on the floor of this House and tries to explain it away.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield in reference to Mr. Mecartney?

Mr. CHURCH. I refuse to yield until I have finished my statement.

I quote from his remarks on page 2844 of the RECORD:

I refer to my statement wherein I explained that Mr. Mecartney, acting as friend of the court, and not as a representative of the select committee, filed a claim for $25,000, only as a means of bringing an important case before a higher court on appeal. We knew, and everyone else knew, that the fee would not be allowed. He took what appeared to him the only course by which this matter of great importance to bondholders could reach the circuit court of appeals.

So that is why this petition for a $25,000 fee was filed? If that is the reason, then why, ladies and gentlemen, did not this attorney take an appeal when his fees were denied? Oh, yes; he appealed all right, but not because his fees were denied. He appealed on other grounds, and that appeal was never perfected.

But there is another thing: If that petition for fees was made solely for the purposes of appeal, then why in his prayer for fees did he state—and I quote from his sworn petition filed on January 17, 1936, see page 2789 of the RECORD:

"That in the alternative if the court denies such prayer", the prayer for a fee of $25,000, "that your petitioner may, by leave of court, appeal directly to all of the bondholders for such allowance * * *."

In other words, if the court would not grant him a fee of $25,000, then he asked the right to appeal by leave of court "directly to all of the bondholders" for such an allowance. Does that read like a petition filed solely for the purpose of appeal? Gentlemen, I am not quite that gullible. That sounds to me like the "real McCoy." That sounds to me like he meant it.

If that is not an earnest petition for fees, I know I shall never see one. Gentlemen, you just cannot explain that away. That is "donating" your time to the bondholders in a "big way."

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHURCH. I refuse to yield.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] may not submit a parliamentary inquiry in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CHURCH. But the Chairman says he saw the danger in Mecartney's act and immediately directed Tupy to notify the court that "Mr. Mecartney was acting contrary to the rules of the committee." Think that one over. First, he says that he knew the petition would not be granted and that it was filed solely for the purpose of appeal, and now he says that after they got Mecartney to file the petition, they notified the court that Mecartney "was acting contrary to the rules of the committee."

If that is the case, boy, oh boy, what a fast one they pulled on Mecartney. Furthermore, the chairman of the select committee intimates that he opposed the granting of the fee to Mecartney and introduces a letter addressed by him to the judge. Gentlemen, that letter is a masterpiece. I ask you to read it carefully. Does it ask the judge to deny the fee? no; it does not. Does it state that Mecartney is not entitled to a fee because of his connection with the select committee? No! It does not. What does it say? It states, and I quote the RECORD, page 2844:

Honorable JUDGE: It has come to our attention that Mr. Newell Mecartney has filed a petition in the above-entitled cause asking for an allowance of a fee for services rendered by him as amicus curiae.

Although Mr. Mecartney has given a great deal of his time and effort to this select committee in its work, it was expressly understood that all such services rendered to this select committee were to be entirely voluntarily and gratuitous, with no obligation on the part of this select committee to reimburse him for same. This has been the universal rule of our committee with reference to all attorneys who were kind enough to assist the committee in its work.

Respectfully yours,

A. J. SABATH,
Chairman of Committee.

That is an interesting letter. You do not have to study it to get the full import of it. That letter advised the judge of just one thing, namely, that Mecartney was not being paid for his services to the court by the select committee. That is all that it says. To me, that letter means—Judge, when you pass on Mecartney's fee, be advised that he is not on the Government pay roll.

If it were not for the protestations of the chairman of the select committee on the floor of this House, I would take that letter to be an implied invitation to the judge to grant the fee of Mr. Mecartney. What other interpretation is it susceptible of? None that I can think of, except, perhaps, that it is notice to the court that the select committee would not be liable for any fee that the court might grant to Mr. Mecartney. But, gentlemen, that is a far cry from saying that the fee should not be paid.

I should like to take up in detail each and every one of the so-called answers by the chairman of the select committee to my statements, but time will not permit. I do want to call your attention to one or two matters.

J. L. TUPY

On Thursday I stated:

Tupy, I am informed, without holding a single bond and not representing any bondholder, formed a protective committee for the bondholders of the Chicago Park Cemetery Co. I also understand, following the appointment of the select committee chairman's law firm as attorneys for the company in place of its former attorney, an agreement was entered into whereby this bondholders' committee formed by Mr. Tupy was to receive $45,000 for their services out of an issue of only $150,000 * * *" (p. 2790 of RECORD).

On Monday the chairman of the select committee denied that statement. I quote his remarks from the RECORD, page 2845:

Mr. Tupy was not a member of the protective committee, but worked with it to accomplish the outcome. He never was a member of any protective committee, and is not now.

Let us look at the record. I quote from the agreement between the bondholders' committee and the Chicago Park Cemetery Co., as that agreement appears in the records of the recorder of Cook County, at page 298 of book 30783. It reads, in part:

This agreement made and entered into this 31st day of May, A. D. 1933, by and between Chicago Park Cemetery Co., a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Illinois, party of the first part, hereinafter called the company; and

Francis Karel, J. L. Tupy, and Charles E. Zitnik, parties of the second part, hereinafter collectively called the committee,

Witnesseth:

That, whereas the company owns and operates a cemetery and a mausoleum therein in Stickney, Ill., said cemetery being known as Mount Auburn Cemetery; and

Whereas heretofore, on January 5, 1929, the company did make, execute, acknowledge, and deliver its certain trust deed (hereinafter sometimes called the original trust deed) to Berwyn State Bank, a corporation, as trustee, conveying, for the uses and purposes set forth in said trust deed, the premises in the county of Cook and State of Illinois, known and described as follows:

* * * * * * *

Which trust deed was filed for record in the office of the recorder of deeds of Cook County, Ill., on January 7, 1929, in book 26545 of records, at page 107 as document no. 10251366; which said trust deed was so executed, delivered, acknowledged, and recorded for the purpose of securing 338 coupon bonds (hereinafter sometimes called original bonds), in the aggregate principal sum of $150,000; and

Whereas said Berwyn State Bank did cease to do business and ceased to act as trustee; and

Whereas by order of the Circuit Court of Cook County entered on February 17, 1932, in a cause entitled "Chicago Park Cemetery Company, a corporation, v. Berwyn State Bank, a corporation, et al." (No. B-234581), the said Straus National Bank & Trust Co. was appointed trustee under said trust deed and did thereafter qualify as such trustee, said Straus National Bank & Trust Co. subsequently changing its corporate name to American National Bank & Trust Co. of Chicago, said American National Bank & Trust Co. of Chicago being now the duly qualified and acting trustee under said trust deed; and

Whereas the company having made default in the payment of interest on said bonds, the trustee filed a bill to foreclose said trust deed in the Superior Court of Cook County in a cause entitled "Straus National Bank and Trust Company, a corporation, as successor trustee, v. Chicago Park Cemetery Co., a corporation" (said cause being No. 563546), which said bill to foreclose is now pending and undetermined; and

Whereas the trustee did thereafter, on October 19, 1932, confess a judgment against the company in the Superior Court of Cook County, in a cause entitled "Straus National Bank and Trust Company, a corporation, as successor trustee, v. Chicago Park Cemetery Company, a corporation" (said cause being No. 567348); and

Whereas a motion to vacate said judgment has heretofore been made, which motion is still pending and undetermined; and

Whereas certain holders and owners of the bonds secured by said trust deed in the aggregate principal sum of $105,000, being not less than 70 percent of the aggregate principal amount of the bonds outstanding, have appointed a committee consisting of Francis Karel, J. L. Tupy, and Charles E. Zitnik, and have authorized, empowered and directed said committee to act for them in all matters appertaining to their respective ownership of said bonds, and have appointed said Francis Karel, J. L. Tupy, and Charles E. Zitnik, as their, and each of their, attorneys in fact, so to act, and have deposited the said bonds so aggregating said principal sum of $105,000 with said committee, said committee being fully authorized to execute this agreement on behalf of said depositing bondholders who have in all respects assented hereto; and

Whereas, the parties hereto and all of said assenting bondholders are desirous of completely settling and adjusting all matters in controversy between them and the entire subject matter of this agreement.

Now, therefore, in consideration of the premises and of the mutual promises and agreements of the parties hereto, and of other good and valuable considerations, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, it is hereby agreed as follows:

I

The company will, upon the execution of this agreement, set aside, reserve, and allot, for the benefit of the bondholders assenting to this agreement, that certain piece or portion of Mount Auburn Cemetery (excepting lots and graves heretofore sold therein), known as Elmwood section, the boundaries of which said section and the extent and location thereof being shown on a map or plat hereto attached, marked "Exhibit A" and by express reference made a part hereof; excepting however, from such reservation and allotment the lots and graves heretofore sold in said section by the company, as aforesaid. The company will duly execute and acknowledge, for the filing of record in the recorder's office of Cook County, such document or documents as in the opinion of its counsel and in the opinion of the committee shall be necessary and proper to evidence said reservation, and to provide against covenants thereof by the company otherwise than for the purposes herein provided.

The committee, or its designate or designates, may sell lots and graves in said allotted portion, and the company will execute deeds or contracts for deeds as directed by the committee. The proceeds from any and all such sales shall be used and applied as follows:

(a) To the payment of commissions upon the sale of lots and graves in said allotted portion, it being expressly understood and agreed that no commissions for the sale of lots and graves in said allotted portion shall be paid or payable by the company.

(b) To the payment to such person or persons of such amount not to exceed the sum of $3,000, as shall be advanced by them for the purpose of paying the fees, charges, and expenses of American National Bank & Trust Co., of Chicago, a corporation, the qualified and acting trustee under the first mortgage trust deed dated January 5, 1929, hereinbefore mentioned, and the fees, charges, and expenses of the attorneys and solicitors of said trustee.

* * * * * * *

Commissions on the sale of lots and graves in said allotted portion shall not exceed 30 percent of the sale price, unless with the consent of the company in writing theretofore first had.

The committee is hereby authorized and empowered to sell, trade, and exchange lots and graves in said allotted portion and, also, lots and graves elsewhere in said cemetery, for cash or upon contract or for said new debenture notes, or for said original bonds not theretofore deposited with the committee, it being distinctly understood and agreed that any commissions which may become due by reason of any sale, trade, or exchange of any lots and graves so sold, traded, or exchanged, both in said allotted portion and elsewhere in said cemetery, shall be payable only out of the proceeds from the sale of lots and graves in said allotted portion. * * *

* * * * * * *

In witness whereof, Chicago Park Cemetery Co., party of the first part, has caused its name to be signed hereto by its president and its corporate seal to be hereto attached, attested by its secretary, and the parties of the second part have affixed their hands and seals, in duplicate, the day and year first above written.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BROWN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 5996, the District of Columbia appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1938, had come to no resolution thereon.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL OF CANADA

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, there is in the city, as we all know, a distinguished citizen of a neighboring and a friendly country, the Governor General of Canada. I think it fitting and proper that the Members should have the privilege of meeting our distinguished guest.

I therefore move that the House stand in recess subject to the call of the Chair.

RECESS

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 39 minutes p. m.) the House stood in recess subject to the call of the Chair.

During the recess the following occurred:

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BLOOM] acting chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] will escort our distinguished visitor to the rostrum.

The Governor General of Canada was escorted to the Speaker's rostrum by Mr. BLOOM and Mr. FISH.

The SPEAKER. I have the honor of presenting to the Members of the House our distinguished guest, His Excellency the Governor General of Canada. [Applause.]

His Excellency the GOVERNOR GENERAL OF CANADA. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House of Representatives, this is a great honor, for which I am most sincerely grateful. I have just had the privilege of being received by the Senate, the upper House. I belong now to the upper house at home, but I have been inside only once and am not very familiar with it as yet. I have come now to a House, in the British Isles the equivalent of which I sat for 8 happy years, and I feel very much at home. [Applause.]

The Governor General, as you know, gentlemen, spends his time walking on very thin ice. It is very hard for him to express an opinion on any subject which is remotely connected with politics, and as nearly everything is connected in some way or other with politics he is wise if he keeps silent. [Laughter and applause.]

But there is one thing he can say freely and with a whole heart. He can express his gratitude to the American people for the pleasure they have given him on this visit and his admiration and affection for your great country.

I have known America now for many years. I have the privilege of the friendship of many Americans; in fact, I can say I have always regarded America as my second fatherland. This visit has been one of unalloyed pleasure. I have renewed many old friendships and made, I hope, some new ones. I have visited some of the famous places in your environs which I had not seen for many years, and I have renewed my acquaintance with your beautiful city, a city which I think will very soon be one of the noblest capitals in the world. I have been favored with wonderful spring weather, I have no doubt, through the brilliant organization of your Postmaster General. [Laughter and applause.]

I would like to say to you one thing, and one thing only: Your Nation and mine are today in a special sense the guardians of that great form of government which we call democracy, and of which I think the truest definition is a true mixture of law and liberty. Therefore, I regard my visit to you this afternoon as a culminating step in a most memorable experience, for I have been admitted into the very inner shrine, the focus, the center, the power-house of your great democracy, your great free Government.

I am proud of the privilege, and I offer you my sincerest thanks. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair may say that His Excellency will stand in the Well of the House and will be delighted to meet the Members of the House of Representatives as they are presented by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLOOM].

His Excellency the Governor General of Canada stood in the Well of the House and was presented to the Members individually by Mr. BLOOM.

AFTER THE RECESS

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by the Speaker at 4:05 p. m.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the proceedings had during the recess be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

INVESTIGATION OF UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York, from the Committee on Rules, reported the following resolution, House Resolution 88, to authorize an investigation of un-American activities, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed.

House Resolution 88

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint a special committee, to be composed of seven members, not more than five of whom may be from the same political party, for the purpose of conducting an investigation of facts regarding (1) the character, objects, extent of operations, roster of membership and officers, all sources of revenue, and distribution of finances by and of any organizations or groups of individuals acting together found operating in the United States for the purpose of diffusing within the United States of slanderous or libelous un-American propaganda of religious, racial, or subversive political prejudices which tends to incite to the use of force and violence or which tends to incite libelous attacks upon the President of the United States or other officers of the Federal Government, whether such propaganda appears to be of foreign or domestic origin; (2) the extent and method of use of the United States mails and United States Postal Service for the transmission and diffusion within the United States of all information and propaganda by, for, or in behalf of all organizations herein authorized to be investigated, including a study of all possible violations of existing postal laws and regulations; and (3) and all other questions in relation thereto which would assist Congress in the enactment of necessary remedial legislation, including necessary amendments to the postal laws.

Such special committee when organized, is hereby authorized to have custody, for its use, of all the records, documents, files, and other papers which were in the possession of the special committee of the House of Representatives, which was appointed and operated pursuant to House Resolution 198, House Resolution 199, and House Resolution 424, of the Seventy-third Congress, second session.

Such special committee is authorized to request the fullest cooperation in the conduct of this investigation from the Department of Justice, the Post Office Department, and such other departments of the Government that the committee may deem necessary, including access to all files from such departments pertinent to the investigation, and use of such employees and facilities of such departments as may be advantageous to the conduct of such investigation.

That said special committee, or any subcommittee thereof, is hereby authorized to sit and act during the present Congress at such times and places within the United States, whether or not the House is sitting, has recessed, or has adjourned, to hold such hearings, to require the attendance of such witnesses, and the production of such records, books, papers, and documents, by subpena or otherwise, and to take such testimony as it may deem necessary.

Subpenas shall be issued under the signature of the Speaker of the House of Representatives at the request of the chairman and shall be served by the Sergeant at Arms of the House or any person designated by him. The chairman of the committee or any member thereof may administer oaths or affirmations to witnesses.

Every person who, having been summoned as a witness by authority of said committee, or any subcommittee thereof, willfully makes default, or who, having appeared, refuses to answer any question pertinent to the investigation heretofore authorized, or who, having been required to produce records, books, papers, and documents pertinent to the investigation heretofore authorized, fails or refuses to produce such required records, books, papers, and documents, shall be held to the penalties provided by section 102 of the Revised Statutes of the United States (U. S. C., title 2, sec. 192), as amended.

DISASTER LOAN CORPORATION

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York, from the Committee on Rules, presented the following report (H. Res. 173), which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed:

House Resolution 173

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 251, a joint resolution to extend the lending authority of the Disaster Loan Corporation to apply to flood disasters in the year 1936. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and continue not to exceed 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, the joint resolution shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the joint resolution for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the joint resolution and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit, with or without instructions.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein an address I delivered on neutrality.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. SANDERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a short telegram relating to the disaster at New London, Tex., where the schoolhouse was blown up.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEMKE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Dakota?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein an article by a college professor in Oklahoma.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I did not understand what was requested to be included.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. An article by a professor in the State University of Oklahoma.

Mr. RICH. We have had so many college professors here advising the people of this country, and we have had so many professors surrounding Washington the last 2 or 3 years, that we want them to stay home in the colleges and attend to the things they are supposed to do. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one-half a minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, President Roosevelt's first fireside chat of his second term was strongly tinged with a note of defense, although the imperiousness which was the outstanding characteristic of his recent radio utterances in his speech to the 1,200 Democratic employees and leaders at the $100-a-plate victory dinner recently was still dominant.

Finally dropping completely the mask which had first hid his real purpose, Mr. Roosevelt in a second vicious assault upon the judicial arm of the Government, made it clear that he believes "we need a Constitution, but the Constitution is what the judges say it is", and that he intends, if possible, to secure the power of dominating the judiciary, including both the inferior and the Supreme Courts, in order that he may be sure of having judges who will say that the Constitution is what Mr. Roosevelt wants it to be.

In opening, Mr. Roosevelt proclaimed that he had previously "described in detail certain economic problems which everyone admits now face the Nation." Outside of the glittering generalities, Mr. Roosevelt in his victory-dinner speech did not deal in the economic problem which faces the country, although in his fireside chat he hinted darkly at what may be assumed to be inflation as being imminent.

Mr. Roosevelt complained that the N. R. A. was invalidated by the Court. It was invalidated by a unanimous decision. In his fireside chat he complained because the gold clause was upheld by the Supreme Court by a 5-to-4 vote. It appears that Mr. Roosevelt wants neither unanimous decisions nor split decisions by the Supreme Court unless they suit his desires and purposes.

Although Mr. Roosevelt says that recovery is speeding up to a point where the inflation dangers of 1929 are again becoming possible, he adds that that danger may not be imminent for a year or two, but seeks to stampede the Congress and the country into enacting his proposal on the ground that it will take so much time for his proposals to pass the Congress and to then be administered that there is not a moment to lose.

It is nearly 2 years ago that the N. R. A., the keystone of his relief and reform program, was declared unconstitutional, and it is singular and noteworthy that Mr. Roosevelt discovered this danger only after all these months, and that apparently like a hobgoblin this menace to the country may jump out of the closet at him and more or less take him unawares. There is no student of affairs in Washington but who knows that Mr. Roosevelt has such control over the banking situation at this time that he could make or prevent inflation, whichever he chooses to do.

Mr. Roosevelt again referred to the Government as a three-horse team, intimating that two of the horses—the executive and legislative departments—are pulling one way, and the Supreme Court in another, and the President emphasized the fact that the American people themselves are in the driver's seat. He makes it apparent, however, that he does not expect the driver to have anything to say about which way the team shall go, but desires the executive department not only to be the lead horse but to drag the other two along whatever furrows Mr. Roosevelt may have in mind as the future course of the Government.

It has been the contention of those who oppose the President's plan that the people are in the driver's seat and should be given the chance to direct the course of government by the constitutional method of an amendment, all of which he is entirely unwilling to permit.

The President accuses the Court openly of having abandoned its purely judicial capacity and of having undertaken to act as a "policy making" body. This, again, is a lack of that candor of which the President has boasted so much in his dealings with the American people.

Every student of the judiciary knows that the whole theory and practice under constitutional government and under the present Supreme Court is for the legislative branch to decide the policy and pass the enabling, or effectuating act, after which the Court, if called upon, measures the act by the Constitution and determines whether or not the act itself effectuating the policy is constitutional. The Supreme Court, in declaring a law invalid, has never said that the Congress cannot seek some other method, which may or may not be constitutional by which to effectuate any policy it may see fit to adopt.

It is obvious that the President now seeks to place upon the Supreme Court the onus for everything that has failed in the way of New Deal experiments. And it remains to be seen whether the American people are going to be fooled by the President's very plausible sales talks.

Mr. Roosevelt asserted that—

> We have, therefore, reached the point as a Nation where we must attempt again to save the Constitution from the Court, and the Court from itself. We must find the way to take an appeal from the Supreme Court to the Constitution itself.

These words sound well, but it is apparent that the task this country faces now is to save both the Court and the Constitution from Mr. Roosevelt.

There is perhaps no point in his entire speech which so clearly shows the casuistry, camouflage, and dissembling that characterizes this whole controversy as Mr. Roosevelt's "tortured construction" of his own party platform. Mr. Roosevelt quoted the part of the platform in his fireside chat which states that—

> If these problems cannot be effectively solved within the Constitution, we shall seek such clarifying amendment as will assure the power to enact those laws adequately to regulate commerce, public health, and safety, and safeguard economic security.

Mr. Roosevelt deliberately avoided reading the rest of that paragraph, which says:

> Thus we propose to maintain the letter and spirit of the Constitution.

With effrontery and apparent contempt for the public intelligence, Mr. Roosevelt then proceeds to say:

> In other words, we said we would seek an amendment only if every other means by legislation were to fail.

Such a construction of that section of the Democratic platform is an insult to the intelligence of every man or woman who can read.

Mr. Roosevelt finally—and this was where he assumed the defensive—pleaded that he, too, wants an independent judiciary. He pleads that he will not undertake to override the courts, and then says along toward the end of his talk:

> This proposal of mine will not infringe in the slightest upon the civil or religious liberties so dear to every American. My record as Governor and as President proves my devotion to those liberties. You who know me can have no fear that I would tolerate the destruction of any branch of the Government, of any part of our heritage of freedom.

What modern dictator ever said otherwise than that until he got the reins of power firmly in his hands?

As stated in the beginning of these comments, this issue has now become perfectly clear. Mr. Roosevelt is demanding the power to hound judges off the bench who have reached the age of 70 who refuse to decide constitutional questions as Mr. Roosevelt wants them decided; and if such Justices will not vacate the bench, Mr. Roosevelt wants the power to appoint other Justices to sit with them who will offset their decisions. It is perfectly clear that it is Mr. Roosevelt's intention, if he can get it, to take such dominant power over the judiciary; and while he states that it would be unthinkable that any President would appoint men to the bench who would agree to put words and implications into the Constitution that are not there in favor of the New Deal, it simply is too much for the American people to swallow when Mr. Roosevelt assures them that he would not do such a thing, because it is an inescapable conclusion that if Mr. Roosevelt means to change the attitude of the courts regarding the New Deal measures he will have to do it by appointing to the bench Justices who are favorable to New Deal legislation.

The American people today are faced with a demand by the President of the United States for the power to so change the personnel of the Federal judiciary of this country as to secure judges who will read into the Constitution words and implications that Mr. Roosevelt wants read into the Constitution. His complaint about split decisions is mere pettifogging, because a Court of 15 members could render split decisions more easily than a Court of 9 members.

Nobody believes that Mr. Roosevelt would replace any judge of 70 who was consistently deciding in favor of Mr. Roosevelt's experiments, so it is the inescapable conclusion that the President has created a precedent utterly beyond anything ever dreamed of in this country by his demand for the power to coerce the decisions of the judiciary, and thereby render permanent his policy of experimentation, which, as he himself oft has reiterated, is a policy of experimentation, and which certainly is a government on a "catch-as-catch-can" basis, if such a government is conceivable.

Mr. Roosevelt continued in his fireside chat to imply that the same interests that opposed his reelection are opposing him in this attempt to create dictatorial power by stampeding Congress and the country into accepting his proposal regarding the courts, while neglecting the perfectly palpable fact that his opposition has come overwhelmingly from leading Democrats including leading Democratic liberals, not only in the Congress, but throughout the country, and it has become obvious that just as Mr. Roosevelt regards the justices in the courts, so he regards anybody who opposes him, as being against liberalism, as being against the ill-clad, the ill-housed, and ill-fed citizens; as being those who put property rights above human life, and that he will brook no opposition if it is possible for him by the power of patronage, punishment, and "persuasion" to get the Congress to enact this dangerous measure.

Mr. Roosevelt did not make it clear; in fact, he did not mention how he expects, even with the addition of six new Justices to the Supreme Court, to help labor by getting another N. R. A. declared constitutional, when the decision outlawing that act was by the unanimous action of all nine of the Justices. It is obvious to any thinking person, however, that he could not hope to load the Supreme Court sufficiently to accomplish this objective, unless he went further and later declared for a further enlargement of the Court.

If Mr. Roosevelt succeeds in having his measure enacted into law, the American people can expect just what one prominent Democratic Senator said recently, "If Mr. Roosevelt is successful, there will be legislation presented to Congress heretofore undreamed of by the American people."

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include therein three or four paragraphs of a court decision of last Tuesday, also part of an agreement filed in the office of the recorder of Cook County, and also quotations from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, to which I have already referred and have discussed and will discuss.

Mr. FULLER rose.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection? Every other matter in connection with this case has been allowed to go into the RECORD, and I think it is unfair to object to this request.

Mr. FULLER. Let me hear his request again.

Mr. SNELL. I think it is rather unfair to object to it.

Mr. FULLER. Let me hear the request again.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will repeat his request.

Mr. CHURCH. I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include therein three or four paragraphs of a court decision of last Tuesday, also part of an agreement filed in the office of the recorder of Cook County, and some quotations from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to which I have already referred and will refer to and discuss.

Mr. NICHOLS. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, may I ask my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania if he does not care to object to this insertion in the RECORD of extraneous matter?

Mr. RICH. May I say to the gentleman, I cannot give time and attention to all these requests, and if the gentlemen over here think some of these things should happen, all right. However, when the gentleman knows the college professors of this country have their duties to perform in the universities of this country and are not here trying to run and regulate the business——

Mr. PHILLIPS. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been demanded.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL, 1938

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5996) making appropriations for the District of Columbia for the fiscal year 1938.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 5996, with Mr. COOPER in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHURCH].

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Chairman, that is what the records show. Deny it if you want to, but it is still the fact. I am glad the chairman of the select committee raised this issue because in rechecking the records I discovered a most important fact. Mr. Tupy's bondholders' committee, in this same instrument in paragraph 4 on page 11, agreed, and I quote:

> The bondholders' committee will cooperate with the company for the purpose of procuring an order by the Superior Court of Cook County vacating the judgment heretofore entered by confession in said cause entitled Straus National Bank & Trust Co., a corporation, as Successor Trustee, v. Chicago Park Cemetery Co., a corporation, said cause being no. 567348, as aforesaid.

Now, gentlemen, just what does that mean? It means simply this, that this bondholders' committee supposedly acting for the benefit of the depositing bondholders agreed with the debtor company, represented by the chairman of the select committee's law firm, Sabath, Perlman, Goodman & Rein, to vacate the judgment obtained for these bondholders in the case of Straus National Bank & Trust Co., as Successor Trustee against the Chicago Park Cemetery Co., in suit no. 567348, whereby those bondholders obtained a first lien on all the property of the company. And what did they get in return for these bondholders whom it was their solemn duty to protect? They took in return notes secured by a mortgage on only part of the property. If that is not selling the bondholders down the river, I would like to know what is. Furthermore, that is selling them down the river to the tune of a potential $45,000 commission to Tupy's bondholders' committee.

But I must proceed. I stated on Thursday that with respect to the Gables Apartment:

The Gables Apartment: Tupy, as owner of this apartment building, bonded it far in excess of its value, either defrauded a bank into making him loans or executed a fraudulent trust deed, and then by refusing to release his right of redemption, which he tried to sell, kept the bondholders from reorganizing, and in the meantime remained in the building, holding two apartments for which he refused to pay rent to the receiver.

In answer to this charge, the chairman of the select committee stated:

My colleague also charged that Mr. Tupy has floated a bond issue on a property far in excess of the value of the property. I have positive evidence and sworn statements that that property on which the issue was $185,000, together with the land, was worth nearly $300,000, and that Mr. Tupy himself put in $99,000 of his own money that he saved during his lifetime and lost every cent of it.

The gentleman charges that Mr. Tupy remains in possession of, or occupies, two of the apartments. The court proceedings will show that he is in there by order of the court having jurisdiction in this matter. I hold in my hand and show you a picture of the apartment building which the gentleman says was overcapitalized. Any man with any knowledge will see that it is a large apartment, covering nearly an entire block in Riverside, one of the finest suburbs of Chicago.

That is a plain misstatement. The property cost only $150,000, and Tupy mortgaged it up to $208,800, and the bonds were sold to the public. The chairman says that he has "positive evidence" that that property "was worth nearly $300,000." Where is that evidence? I have not seen it nor has anyone else. Where is this "positive evidence" that this building which sold at foreclosure for less than $90,000 was worth $300,000? If that statement is correct, why has not the holder of the equity of redemption stepped forward and redeemed it? The only evidence introduced by the chairman of the select committee was a picture which he held in his hand. Gentlemen, the answer is so obvious it deserves no further comment.

As to Tupy's either defrauding a bank or executing a fraudulent trust deed, those facts as taken from the court records are fully set forth in my statement on Thursday on page 2791 of the RECORD. There you will find the record of the man the chairman sees fit to defend.

The chairman would have you believe that since the formation of the select committee his law firm has studiously refrained from representing the Chicago Title & Trust Co. Gentlemen, I question that statement. Why, I am told that only last Friday, March 26, 2 full days before he made his reply on this floor to my remarks, his law firm presented to the Chicago Title & Trust Co. the usual formal demand to bring new foreclosure proceedings on two issues underwritten by the Cody Trust Co. I do not know at the present moment whether or not that is a fact. Certainly the chairman of the select committee does. I ask him to advise us.

I said on Thursday that the chairman's law firm "of Sabath, Perlman, Goodman & Rein represents the Chicago Title & Trust Co. in some 75 different reorganizations." In support of that statement I quoted the testimony of Mr. Peterson of the Chicago Title & Trust Co. given before Special Master Charles A. McDonald, on October 21, 1935, in case no. 59128.

That statement is not denied by the chairman of the select committee, but, says he, his firm represented the Chicago Title & Trust Co. as trustee or as the nominal plaintiff (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 2842, 2d column). The important thing is that they were representing it in October 1935, in upward of 75 different reorganizations, at the very time the chairman in his other capacity was howling to high heaven about its activities. We know that in one of these cases they got a fee of $2,000 and if that be taken as the average—which I presume is too low—they will receive at least $150,000 for this representation of the Chicago Title & Trust Co.

HYDE PARK-KENWOOD NATIONAL BANK

I stated that law firms had been ousted and the law firm of the chairman of the select committee appointed. He admits that is the case with the receiver of the Hyde Park-Kenwood National Bank. He then goes into great detail to justify certain actions of his firm in behalf of that receiver. For what reason? Certainly I never said anything about his firm bringing immature suits. Somebody else may have done so, but I have not to date made that charge.

H. O. STONE & CO.

I said that "the firm of Sabath, Perlman, Goodman & Rein now represents a number of the committees reorganizing the H. O. Stone properties."

The answer of the chairman of the select committee was evidently intended as a denial of that statement, for he quoted the following statement from a letter signed by Avery Brundage dated March 26, 1937:

The firm of Sabath, Perlman, Goodman & Rein has never represented this committee.

That statement is true. The firm did not represent "this committee." But that is only part of the story. Let me remind him of just one case in this connection. In the matter of 6306-18 Northwestern Avenue Building Corporation, District Court of the United States, Northern District of Illinois, no. 60345, a voluntary petition under section 77B was filed by the building corporation for the reorganization of an issue of bonds sold by H. O. Stone & Co. on property known as the Western Block. Sabath, Perlman, Goodman & Rein were cocounsel for the building corporation and, together with Messrs. McFarland, Martin, and Stearns, were allowed fees aggregating $3,250 in connection with the reorganization.

CODY TRUST CO.

I said that the law firm of the chairman of the select committee—Sabath, Perlman, Goodman & Rein—represented a number of the committees for issues underwritten by the Cody Trust Co.

In answering this charge, the chairman of the select committee stated:

The members of the protective committee of the Cody Trust Co. were clients of M. W. Petacque associated with Sabath, Perlman, Goodman & Rein for sometime before 1933.

In December 1933 Cody Trust Co. went into receivership and one of its personnel, Mr. Albert J. Peterson, was given powers of attorney from holders of about $1,000,000 in its defaulted bonds.

At that time Mr. Peterson employed Mr. Petacque as the committee's counsel.

I do not care when they got the case. The truth is that they represent the protective committee and have been representing it while the senior member of the firm acts as chairman of the select committee.

LEIGHT-HOLZER

I also said that his firm represented committees for issues underwritten by Leight-Holzer. I know there is no Leight-Holzer committee. I never said there was, nor did I say his firm represented the Holzer committee. The chairman made much of this in his reply. He left the plain implication that his firm had no connection with the issues of either the Leight committee or the Holzer committee. From his reply no one will doubt his complete familiarity with all the details of his law firm's work. Why, he even knows it right down to the dates. Thus, he certainly must have known that his law firm represents the Leight trustees. I made my statement on this matter to see what the able chairman would say about this.

As chairman of the committee he poses as the great friend of the bondholder. Then we remove the cloak and see him as the senior member of his law firm, with that law firm representing the trustees fighting tooth and toenail to beat the bondholders and advance the cause of the trustees representing subordinate issues.

On last Tuesday, just after the chairman of the select committee dramatically closed his remarks on Monday, and while his committee members were addressing the House, a decision was handed down by the appellate court, second division, in a foreclosure suit involving Leight & Co. The chairman's law firm—Sabath, Perlman, Goodman & Rein—represented the Leight trustees, the plaintiffs in that case. Let us pause for a moment and look at that decision.

Leight & Holzer were formerly partners. They split up, and each carried on his independent business. Leight went through bankruptcy, effected a reorganization whereby certain trustees, Paul C. Loeber, Charles E. Fox, and Albert W. Swayne, took over the assets of his company, and the Chairman's law firm, Sabath, Perlman, Goodman & Rein, became their attorneys. These trustees stand in the position of the underwriter, and these interests are in conflict with the bondholders. It is the activities of these trustees, represented by the chairman's law firm in their attempt to secure a preferential position detrimental to the interest of bondholders, which I am about to recount and which the appellate court in an unanimous opinion says were, in effect, "an active fraud upon the bondholders." The case is Paul C. Loeber v. 14 West Elm Street Building Corporation, a corporation, et al., appellate court, no. 38907.

The opinion was handed down last Tuesday, March 30, by the appellate court, second division, reversing a decree of the circuit court of Cook County, which gave the Leight Trust a lien on the 14 West Elm Street property prior to the present interests of the former bondholders on that property. The opinion was written by Justice John J. Sullivan and concurred in by Justices Friend and Scanlan.

The Leight Trust was formed for the purpose of liquidating the assets of Leight & Co. for the benefit of the creditors of Leight & Co. Among the assets of Leight & Co. assigned to the Leight Trust were interest coupons in the amount of $36,013.21, which had originally been attached to bonds sold by Leight & Co. on the 14 West Elm Street property. This bond issue was originally in the amount of $875,000. The 14 West Elm Street property was reorganized, and the former bondholders received certificates of interest in the stock of the new corporation, which now holds title to the 14 West Elm Street property. As a part of the reorganization, a new mortgage of $120,000 was placed on the property. The proceeds of this mortgage were used to pay the expenses of the reorganization and taxes, also $4,375 to Leight trustees for office expense.

The circuit court proceeding was an attempt to have the interest coupons, which, with accumulated interest, amount to about $40,000, declared to be a first-mortgage lien ahead of the new reorganization first mortgage and ahead of the interests of the former bondholders in the property.

The decree entered in the circuit court found that the Leight trust was entitled to a lien in the amount of $14,405.26, together with interest from January 5, 1931, and directed that, upon the failure of the new corporation to pay the amount due, the property be sold to satisfy this indebtedness. The circuit court decree included an allowance of a fee to the firm of Sabath, Perlman, Goodman & Rein, for their services in the amount of $1,500.

An appeal was prosecuted to the appellate court from this decree by the building corporation and by the holder of the new first mortgage on the property. The appellate court reversed the decree of the circuit court and directed the circuit court to dismiss the proceeding for want of equity.

The Leight trust was represented in the appellate court, as well as in the circuit court, by Sabath, Perlman, Goodman & Rein.

This is what the court had to say about these activities:

It is not charged that plaintiffs were guilty of fraudulent intent when they failed to present their claim during the period when the bondholders were being induced to accept the reorganization plan, and it is immaterial whether the failure of the Leight trust to assert its rights at that time was due purely to oversight or was due to misapprehension by plaintiffs as to the law. They did not assert their claim when they should have done so and to permit them to do so now, contrary to the assurance which they joined in giving to the bondholders that the consummation of the reorganization plan would result in their (bondholders) beneficial ownership of the property "subject only to the new first mortgage loan" would be to sanction what in effect would be an active fraud upon the bondholders.

* * * * * * *

Regardless of such facts as were within the knowledge of the bondholders or which were equally accessible to them, the material and all-important thing which they had no knowledge of, and which plaintiffs had induced them to believe did not exist, was the lien which the Leight trustees now attempt to assert. By reason of the conduct of plaintiffs, the bondholders agreed to the plan of reorganization in the confident belief that through their beneficial-trust certificates in the stock of the 14 West Elm Street Building Corporation they would be the sole owners of the entire property subject only to the new first-mortgage lien of $120,000.

* * * * * * *

The bondholders surely were not chargeable with the duty of discovering plaintiffs' rights, and we think it would be unconscionable under all the circumstances to now impose upon them the burden of plaintiffs' lien claim amounting with interest to more than $40,000.

* * * * * * *

I do not want to be unfair to the chairman of the select committee and therefore I shall not comment on that decision, but let each of you draw your own conclusions.

So much for the statements which I made on Thursday and the reply of the chairman of the select committee on Monday. I believe that I have demonstrated to you that everything I said was true.

Insofar as the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. O'MALLEY] are concerned, let me say that when he states that "innuendo is a weapon of stealth. It destroys men's reputations", I agree with him. My only regret is that he did not heed his own advice, for when he implies that my remarks were motivated by causes other than the ones I stated, he does me a gross injustice. That is the worst type of insinuation and innuendo. Needless to say, I resent it just as I resent his insinuation that I criticized certain of the activities of his committee because most of the select committee's witnesses "live in the Evanston gentleman's 'silk stocking' district."

I criticized his committee because of certain acts which have since been admitted on this very floor by the chairman of the select committee. I challenge any Member of this body to rise and defend the direct solicitation of the deposit of bonds which is admitted by the chairman of the select committee. Will any Member of this body defend the petition for fees of Mr. Mecartney when he acted as attorney for the select committee? Will any Member of this body rise and defend the record of Mr. Tupy, the chief investigator of our select committee? If the gentleman from Wisconsin has any doubts about my sincerity and motives for criticizing his select committee, now is the time for him to rise and defend the actions which I have complained about. Let that defense be of the acts complained of and not a stump speech of innuendo and insinuation as to the motives of him who presents the charges.

On Tuesday we heard from the lips of the gentleman of Wisconsin a most amazing statement. That there may be no mistake, I shall quote his statement and the remarks to which it was addressed:

Mr. KELLY of Illinois. I remind the gentleman from Wisconsin that Judge Barnes, since his name has been brought into this discussion, was sitting as a Federal judge, and did receive a fee of $35,000 from the Chicago Title & Trust Co.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Our committee was informed of that, and an attorney of our committee, using that as a basis, asked for a change of venue in a bondholders' case and the judge refused to grant the change of venue.

The remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLY] are susceptible of only one interpretation, namely, that Judge Barnes received a fee from the Chicago Title & Trust Co. while sitting on the bench. To those remarks the gentleman from Wisconsin answers, "our committee was informed of that * * *." That is a serious charge, one that no man should utter lest he be in possession of positive proof.

Whether it is true or not is something that we shall soon know, for I have called on the Committee on the Judiciary of the House to make an investigation. If it is not true, and I feel certain that it is not, the grievous hurt and wrong that has been done that judge can never be entirely undone, but certainly those who made it should apologize to this House and to that judge.

To my friend, the gentleman from New York [Mr. CULKIN], I can only say that I deeply regret that he did not attend the hearings of the select committee in Chicago, for had he done so I know full well the things which I have complained of would not have transpired. And to my colleague from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] I can only utter the belief that had he known of the things of which I have spoken he would not have permitted them to come to pass. I know he will not defend these actions. I feel certain that he did not know all that was going on in that office of the select committee in Chicago. I join with him when he voices in this joyous Easter season his regret that these dark, ugly things should shadow the birth of a new season. But I must say to him that in my humble opinion it is better that these things be known and forever stopped, though they cloud the birth of a new season, if by virtue of their disclosure some tangible, definite legislative action shall result, bringing to these thousands of little bondholders the birth of a new era of justice, honesty, and integrity.

Much did we hear on Tuesday from the lips of the gentleman from Wisconsin of the arduous efforts of the select committee to bring forth corrective legislation. I have studied the hearings before the subcommittee of the House Judiciary Committee in March of last year, and I attended and appeared at the hearing before the full committee of the House Judiciary Committee on Tuesday.

Gentlemen, there is one thing that stands out in both of those hearings—someone other than a member of the select committee was called at both hearings to explain the bill introduced by the chairman of the select committee. At the first hearing it was William J. Powers. And who is he? At this last hearing it was H. M. Garsson. Who is this Mr. Garsson? Those questions I shall answer at the proper time and place. They are food for thought.

I regret having to make this statement. I especially regret that in this discussion we seem to have lost sight of the real issue. We seem to have neglected the all-important question: What is this Congress going to do to aid these bondholders? That is the primary matter in which I am interested.

It is recognized that the select committee has rendered yeoman service in bringing to light the shortcomings and loopholes in our bankruptcy laws. They have been of service in pointing out the evils that exist in reorganization procedure. None of us can fail to recognize that service. It could hardly be otherwise, considering the fact that for approximately 3 years and at a cost of $110,000 this committee has been investigating.

Mr. Chairman, I am therefore asking that the committee make its final report. I am asking this Congress to take into consideration how this investigation has become more than a mere investigation while the bondholders are without the needed relief. If we are ever going to help the bondholders, it will have to be now. As a matter of fact, it would have been far better if we had stopped this investigation before now.

My thesis is that we need legislative action and not just stump speeches as to the bondholders' needs. My thesis is that the activities of the select committee have been such that it does not retain the confidence of the people. To continue it means only further delay and more aggravation of the situation. I ask for a final report and immediate legislative action for the bondholders. Stop investigating—legislate. That is what I urged in my address last Thursday and before the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I would greatly appreciate it if my colleague would put in the entire opinion from which he has quoted and that I do not know anything about. And if he will be fair enough to put in the dates of all the cases that have been handled by the firm to which the gentleman from Illinois has referred, I will be thankful to him, because I know that all those matters were with the firm long before the committee was formed. I do not believe the gentleman feels that the firm should have given up all of its business because I, who have only a slight interest in the firm, and which I joined in 1931 because it was recognized as one of the outstanding law firms in Chicago, and have no interest whatever in any business brought them by their clients, and certainly never knew there were such cases, and I never have been in court on any of them and do not know anything about them except what these different lawyers have sent me, denying the charges propounded by the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, my colleague quotes fees. He knows the select committee did not question fair fees, but if he wants to know something about outrageous and high fees, why does he not confer with his close friends connected with the Chicago Title & Trust Co., whose names for the present I shall not mention. Moreover, why does he not check the fees of his friends on protective committees, especially the receivers of the Stevens Building, Sherman Hotel, and other properties, where some have drawn $1,250 per month per property. Yes; in some instances as much as $25,000 a year—just plain milking of funds that rightfully belong to bondholders. They surely could give him real information. And for further authentic figures on fees, why does he not examine the printed hearings of the select committee, as well as the hearings of a subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee? But you and I know that is not what he desires. In fact, that is what he seeks to prevent coming to light.

Now, I may say to my colleague, to show that I am just a little fairer than he has been, that someone did make a statement about a $35,000 fee obtained by his friend Judge Barnes. We have had that evidence, and the matter is being prepared, and I tried to get the floor the other day to state that he received the fee through the Chicago Title & Trust Co. for services he rendered before he became a judge. There is no denial of his receiving the fee, but unfortunately I did not get the floor, and I could not correct the statement made.

Mr. CHURCH. And before he went on the bench, and the Senate determined that matter before he was confirmed and knew all about it.

Mr. SABATH. I do not know about the Senate.

Mr. CHURCH. And was not the gentleman with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLY] the other day when he asked the question? Did not the gentleman put the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLY] up to asking that question?

Mr. SABATH. That statement is absolutely false; I did not. As I understand, the fee was allowed him several days before he was confirmed; but that is neither here nor there. I brought it out only to show that an application for change of venue was placed before Judge Barnes because, just prior to his elevation to the bench, he was the attorney for the Chicago Title & Trust Co. as receivers in the celebrated Garard bankruptcy case, and while their attorney he received the fee.

Mr. KELLY of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield.

Mr. KELLY of Illinois. I wonder if the gentleman can enlighten the members of the committee as to how many cases Judge Barnes has presided over since he has been a Federal judge where the Chicago Title & Trust Co. has been a party litigant?

Mr. SABATH. Oh, I do not know. There must have been, perhaps, 50 or 75 or 100 of them.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. SABATH. I cannot yield now.

I wish I could have the time to answer every statement of the gentleman, and I would do so positively with court records that the gentleman would be obliged to admit he has been misinformed, that he has obtained information not based on facts, and that he would apologize to the House and to the gentlemen he assailed as well as to myself for many of the statements that he has made. I have been receiving unsolicited information from numerous sources about the gentleman that may be interesting, but I will not use it before it is fully verified.

Mr. CHURCH. Bring it out.

Mr. SABATH. Oh, I may, but I am not in that line unless I become positive of all facts. I shall give it to the gentleman if he wants it. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHURCH] rehashes the same charges that he made last Thursday against Mr. Mecartney and Mr. Tupy, and again cites cases which he claims were handled by my law firm. But again he fails to state those matters were in the law firm's office—the records will bear out—before the creation of the Select Committee to Investigate Real Estate Bondholders' Reorganizations. I have asked him, and would appreciate now, if, instead of only putting in or only mentioning excerpts of these matters, he would put in the entire record. Short excerpts or partial statements do not cover the full facts. Since the gentleman has leave to extend, I hope he will comply with my request.

As to charges he reiterates against Mr. Mecartney—and incidentally I learned that he has called upon Mr. Mecartney since last Thursday, paid for his luncheons, and took him for a ride, during the course of which he apologized for his unfair attack upon him, and also admitted on the floor that he is an honest and honorable man—yet a few minutes ago he again refers to an imaginary fee of $25,000, which Mr. Mecartney did not receive. I repeat that Mr. Mecartney asked for this fee, not as a representative of the select committee but as a "friend of the court", serving so upon appointment from the judge. The moment I received advice from Chicago that he was asking for the fee—I was in Washington at that time—immediately I wrote the judge that Mecartney, as a member of the staff of the select committee, was not entitled to any fees. What else would he have had me do? The attempt of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHURCH] in endeavoring here to find fault with the letter I sent to Judge Wilkerson, and to interpret into it meanings of his own fertile imagination, is ridiculous and does not deserve any further answer from me.

The gentleman again alludes to Mr. Joseph L. Tupy, chief investigator of the select committee in Chicago, in connection with the Gables apartments in Riverside, Ill. I have requested, and will have from Mr. Tupy, a sworn statement as to the actual cost of the building which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHURCH] claims was overcapitalized to the detriment of bondholders. Ladies and gentlemen, please remember that this building was built in 1926, 8 years before the select committee was created. Mr. Tupy admits he lives in the building, but with the approval of the court. This very pertinent fact the gentleman deliberately fails to restate. The gentleman read from a recorded document about the Chicago Park Cemetery. He failed to state that it is the contract and the first mortgage which Mr. Tupy secured for the benefit of bondholders to save their questionable investment, and that Mr. Tupy's signature appears on it with two others and with the signature of the cemetery company, not as a member of any bondholders' protective committee, but in execution of the contract for the benefit of bondholders.

Repeatedly the gentleman charges that my law firm handled cases for the Chicago Title & Trust Co. The gentleman does not differentiate the two types of cases that arise out of transactions in which the Chicago Title & Trust Co. appears in litigation. Any lawyer in Chicago knows that that company has hundreds of cases in which it has a corporate interest—note, and I want it to appear in capital letters—Corporate Interests. It is in that class of cases that I reassert my law firm has not acted since the creation of the select committee. The other type of case consists of those where the Chicago Title & Trust Co. is shown as trustee under the trust indenture, but in which owners of mortgages or bonds are represented by their own counsel, even though the Chicago Title & Trust Co., of legal necessity, may appear as party litigant. The Chicago Title & Trust Co. probably acts as such trustee in 90 percent of trust indentures in Cook County, Ill., in a very great many instances having been specified to that capacity without its knowledge or permission by the issuers of the trust deeds. I believe that probably three-fourths of the law firms and lawyers in Chicago since 1929 have appeared for their own clients in such proceedings, although nominally the Chicago Title & Trust Co. shows up in them as plaintiff because of its trusteeship. In some such cases Mr. Perlman and associates of my firm have acted for the actual owners of mortgages and bonds. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHURCH] should reread my remarks of last Monday on this point in the RECORD. There it is fully and clearly explained; and if he avoids distortion of their truth or their meaning I am sure he will find them enlightening.

Another surprising thing is the gentleman's sudden interest in bondholders. When one considers that for 2½ years he failed to raise a finger to aid the select committee in its fight to eliminate vicious practices of protective committees it has been investigating, his condolences to bondholders now indeed seem belated. If by his attacks he thinks he is going to prejudice the minds of bondholders and of the country due to the publicity he is inspiring in the newspapers, again, I am sure, he will fail just as he has failed by his tactics to prejudice the membership of this House. I am sure 90 percent of the Members of this body recognize my service and appreciate that the select committee has performed a really constructive task in the interest of bondholders. Is it possible that the gentleman feels that if the bill is enacted many of the gentlemen who have been and are members of protective committees, who handle from 50 to 400 properties and who now are having themselves designated as voting trustees in reorganizations so they can usurp absolute control, management, and milking privileges of properties for the next 10, 15, and even 20 years, will be put out in the cold so that bondholders may recapture their property rights?

It is indeed, amazing, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHURCH] should have remained silent for 2½ years; and now, when the Judiciary Committee again took up the consideration of the select committee's bill—and which I have assurances shortly will be favorably reported out—he should make these distorted statements. If he is under the impression that his wild, reckless, and unfounded assertions will prevent passage of the bill, I am sure he is mistaken.

The criticism the gentleman directs at my colleagues, Representative O'MALLEY and Representative CULKIN, does not need, and is not worthy of, reply, unless it be his statement that the gentleman from New York [Mr. CULKIN] was not present last Tuesday at the Judiciary Committee's hearing on the conservator bill, H. R. 9. Mr. CULKIN was there and presented his views in favor of the bill most ably. The amazing thing was the presence there of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHURCH] for a few minutes, for the first time during our fight for the passage of the bill.

By innuendo the gentleman charges that I have benefited indirectly from the chairmanship of the select committee, which I have refuted last Monday. In no more truth can he state honestly that, regardless of cases handled by my firm and my association with it, it was not investigated perhaps more severely or thoroughly than other law firms, and as penetratingly as the select committee could, since my association with the firm had no bearing on it. If he will read the record of the committee hearings, especially as it refers to the Chicago Title & Trust Co., he will find that if there was any firm subjected to rigid investigation it was that one, especially with relation to its trust 17400. Its main officers were put on the grill. At one time the select committee had as many as six accountants in its offices going through the records of that octopus. Since the gentleman seems to feel we have not penetrated the activities of that institution fully, I will give him an opportunity to aid us in compilation of a report of the evidence which has been adduced regarding that firm during the last hearings, and I will thank him if he is able to strengthen it in any particulars. The hearings, the evidence, and all the court records are at his disposal, and I hope he will avail himself of my offer.

Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, I greatly regret that I should have permitted myself to be overcome last Monday. After reflection, and upon solicitation on the part of so many of you, I am coming to the conclusion that the gentleman has rendered me a real service although he intended the opposite. He has proven to me, beyond doubt, that you resent and disapprove of unfair tactics, hitting below the belt, or stabbing in the back. From the assurances and encouragement I have received from you, I am satisfied that unfairness on the gentleman's part will bring favorable results to the bill and that its passage will be expedited and made certain. To me this will be a reward that will compensate me for the anguish he has caused me.

Henceforth, Mr. Chairman, on advice of outstanding Members on both sides, I shall ignore whatever may be supplied the gentleman by the billion-dollar racketeer plunderbund for any further harassment of the select committee and me.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ELLENBOGEN].

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Chairman, I have the greatest respect and admiration for the chairman of the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations for the District of Columbia, and for the members of that committee, but I believe they have made a mistake in regard to the appropriation for the District unemployment compensation fund, and I hope they will be willing to correct it.

The committee has eliminated from this bill an appropriation of $175,000 which is mandatory under the law, and which was recommended by the Bureau of the Budget. The unemployment compensation law for the District of Columbia in section 5 provides as follows:

SEC. 5 (a). The District of Columbia shall pay contributions in addition to its contributions as an employer in the following amounts: For the calendar year 1936, $100,000; for the calendar year 1937, $125,000; and for the calendar year 1938, $175,000.

The members of the committee will notice that the language of this bill is not the same language which is inserted in legislative enactments and which generally reads:

There is hereby authorized to be appropriated—

And so forth. A maximum sum is generally fixed, and discretion is left to the Committee on Appropriations whether the amount authorized shall be appropriated, or how much of it shall be appropriated. But the District unemployment compensation law specifically provides that the District of Columbia "shall" make that contribution. When the subcommittee neglected to appropriate that amount, it substituted its own judgment for the judgment of the Congress.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION CANNOT PROPERLY FUNCTION WITHOUT SUCH CONTRIBUTION

Elimination of this contribution would destroy the character of the unemployment insurance law for the District of Columbia. It would make it impossible to liberalize its provisions. Moreover, the law in the District of Columbia, like the law in the States, provides for the payment of unemployment insurance benefits only for limited periods of time, and unless this money is in the fund, unemployment compensation benefits, of course, cannot be paid. If the unemployment insurance fund is unable to pay the unemployment compensation benefits required by this law or by a liberalized law, then the unemployed in the District of Columbia will have to be taken care of by the P. W. A. or by some other Federal agency. In that case Federal funds would have to be used to take care of the unemployed in the District instead of District funds, as required by law, and, of course, the officials of the District of Columbia are in favor of that. They think that this is a method by which they can obtain Federal funds without having them designated as such.

I call the attention of the House to the history of the District unemployment compensation law and of this particular provision. It was carefully considered by a subcommittee of the Committee on the District of Columbia, and by the full committee. Testimony was taken, witnesses appeared before the committee including the Secretary of Labor. It was presented to the House, was carefully considered by the House and was passed without one dissenting voice and without one dissenting vote. It was sent over to the Senate and passed by the Senate. A disagreement arose between the House and the Senate and the matter was referred to a conference committee of the House and the Senate. The provision which we are now discussing was the main provision in dispute between the House and the Senate.

CONTRIBUTION BY DISTRICT GOVERNMENT MAKES THIS ACT SOUND ECONOMICAL

Mr. Chairman, every student of unemployment insurance has criticized the provisions in the Federal Social Security Act by which unemployment compensation benefit payments are financed.

Under this act the money to pay unemployment compensation benefits is obtained by a tax on employers, beginning with 1 percent in 1936, 2 percent in 1937, and 3 percent the next year, and by a similar tax upon employees. Naturally, the employers will add the cost of this tax to the cost of production, so that the contribution of the employers will be reflected in higher prices.

The entire method of financing unemployment compensation benefits means a decrease in the purchasing power of the American people, and to that extent it will mean more unemployment instead of less. It will also mean the acceleration of the installation of labor-saving devices, and thus, again, more unemployment.

The District of Columbia Act is the only act that provides for contribution by the Government. This provision in the local act was hailed all over the Nation as establishing a sound method of dealing with unemployment insurance. The District act was referred to as a model for the entire Nation. It adopts a method which has been proven sound in England and in other European countries.

Now, Mr. Chairman, without consideration by a legislative committee, without practically any consideration by the Appropriations Committee, without the testimony of experts, without hearing anybody who favored this part of the act, the law is to be set aside, the contribution of the District Government is to be eliminated, and the model bill is to be destroyed. I am calling the attention of the members of the committee to this defect in the pending appropriation bill. An amendment will be presented tomorrow to restore this sum. It is a small sum, but it is of tremendous importance, and I hope the members of the committee will vote for the amendment tomorrow.

I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. O'CONNOR of New York] having resumed the chair, Mr. COOPER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 5996, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of my remarks and the remarks of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ENGEL] tomorrow on the pending bill we proceed to read the bill for amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

Mr. HARLAN, from the Committee on Rules, presented the following resolution (H. Res. 174, Rept. No. 536) providing for the consideration of the bill (S. 1228) to amend the National Housing Act, for printing in the RECORD:

House Resolution 174

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of S. 1228, a bill to amend the National Housing Act. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and continue not to exceed 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit, with or without instructions.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted, as follows:

To Mr. DEEN, for the balance of the week, on account of important business.

To Mr. SHANLEY, for 1 day, on account of illness in his family.

To Mr. COCHRAN, until Wednesday, on account of important business.

BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee did on March 31, 1937, present to the President, for his approval, bills of the House of the following titles:

H. R. 635. An act for the relief of Mary Daley;

H. R. 2773. An act to authorize the settlement of individual claims for personal property lost or damaged, arising out of the activities of the Civilian Conservation Corps, which have been approved by the Secretary of War; and

H. R. 3630. An act for the relief of E. C. Willis, father of the late Charles R. Willis, a minor.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 47 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Friday, April 2, 1937, at 12 o'clock noon.

Mr. AUSTIN. I announce that the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] is absent because of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

REPORT OF UNITED STATES RAILROAD ADMINISTRATION

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith for the information of the Congress the Annual Report of the United States Railroad Administration for the year ended December 31, 1936.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 2, 1937.

[Note: Report accompanied similar message to the House of Representatives.]

SALARIES, CAPITOL POLICE (S. DOC. NO. 49)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation for the legislative establishment, salaries of Capitol Police, for the fiscal year

1938, in the sum of $38,880, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

TARIFF ON ARTICLES FROM THE VIRGIN ISLANDS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to amend the Tariff Act of 1930 with reference to articles coming into the United States from the Virgin Islands, and for other purposes, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Finance.

TARIFF COMMISSION REPORT ON DRESSED OR DYED FURS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Chairman of the United States Tariff Commission, transmitting a report (submitted to the President) of an investigation made, under the provisions of law, respecting dressed or dyed furs, and in response to Senate Resolution 250, Seventy-fourth Congress, which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on Finance.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Colorado, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

Senate Joint Memorial 7

Whereas relief checks in Colorado have been cut at least 50 percent during the month of March; and

Whereas hundreds of families are suffering and facing starvation, and many are being evicted from their homes because they are unable to pay their rent with these small relief checks; and

Whereas the financial problems which confront the State legislature are of such a nature as to make it almost impossible to immediately make funds available for relief purposes; and

Whereas it has come to our attention that the Federal Government has from time to time assisted various States to meet their relief needs in periods of crisis; and

Whereas immediate funds are needed to prevent actual starvation and suffering of hundreds of families in the State of Colorado: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Legislature of the State of Colorado in joint memorial petition the Federal Government to immediately assist the State in meeting this crisis by matching funds which are available in the State on a dollar-for-dollar basis; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this memorial be sent to the President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the Vice President of the United States, Senator Edwin Johnson, Senator Alva Adams, Hon. Harry Hopkins, and the four Representatives from Colorado.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by Farmers' Local Union, No. 111, Fillmore, N. Dak., favoring the enactment of legislation to enlarge the membership of the Supreme Court, and also the adoption of certain amendments to the Constitution of a progressive character, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by Clan Cameron, No. 120, and Kinoka Council, No. 295 (Degree of Pocahontas), both of Pittsburgh, Pa., favoring the enactment of the so-called McCarran-Mead bill, providing longevity pay to postal employees, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. GIBSON presented a resolution adopted by Eclipse Grange, No. 255, Patrons of Husbandry, of Thetford, Vt., protesting against the enactment of legislation to enlarge the membership of the Supreme Court, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LODGE presented memorials, numerously signed, of sundry citizens of the State of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to enlarge the membership of the Supreme Court, or other legislation of a similar character, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DUFFY presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin memorializing Congress to enact legislation to encourage the reforestation of farm wood lots and slope lands, the discontinuance of grazing thereon, and the planting of shelterbelts, by providing Federal aid to the States, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

(See joint resolution printed in full when laid before the Senate by the Vice President on Apr. 1, 1937, pp. 2993–2994, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. BURKE, from the Committee on Claims, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each with amendments and submitted reports thereon:

S. 545. A bill for the relief of John Mulhern (Rept. No. 283); and

S. 1479. A bill for the relief of the estate of Charles White (Rept. No. 284).

By Mr. GIBSON:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 123) to provide for a study of traffic conditions in the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

CONTROL AND PREVENTION OF CANCER

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I ask consent to introduce a bill signed by 94 Members of the United States Senate, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill authorizes the expenditure of $1,000,000 a year for research into the causes of cancer, such work to be done under the direction of the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service of the United States. I know that it is the sincere desire of these Members that from now on an unending warfare be carried on against this scourge, which has brought unspeakable misery and death to so many. The victims of cancer might have been saved had society provided an adequate means of attacking the problem through an intelligent coordination of all the agencies of modern science.

That is what the bill provides. It is unique in the parliamentary history of this country in that it is sponsored by practically every Member of this honorable body, each of whom makes the bill a personal message of hope and cheer to those who live in the shadow of a great fear.

It has seemed best to commit the bill to the care of the Committee on Commerce, because the able chairman of that committee is a physician of outstanding ability, whose sound judgment may be trusted to correct any errors or omissions. I know the committee will return it to us shaped into a splendid instrument of social service.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill will be received and referred as requested by the Senator from Washington.

By Mr. BONE (for himself, Mr. ADAMS, Mr. ANDREWS, Mr. ASHURST, Mr. AUSTIN, Mr. BACHMAN, Mr. BAILEY, Mr. BANKHEAD, Mr. BARKLEY, Mr. BILBO, Mr. BLACK, Mr. BORAH, Mr. BRIDGES, Mr. BROWN of Michigan, Mr. BROWN of New Hampshire, Mr. BULKLEY, Mr. BULOW, Mr. BURKE, Mr. BYRD, Mr. BYRNES, Mr. CAPPER, Mrs. CARAWAY, Mr. CHAVEZ, Mr. CLARK, Mr. CONNALLY, Mr. COPELAND, Mr. DAVIS, Mr. DIETERICH, Mr. DONAHEY, Mr. DUFFY, Mr. ELLENDER, Mr. FRAZIER, Mr. GEORGE, Mr. GIBSON, Mr. GILLETTE, Mr. GLASS, Mr. GREEN, Mr. GUFFEY, Mr. HALE, Mr. HARRISON, Mr. HATCH, Mr. HAYDEN, Mr. HERRING, Mr. HITCHCOCK, Mr. HOLT, Mr. HUGHES, Mr. JOHNSON of California, Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado, Mr. KING, Mr. LA FOLLETTE, Mr. LEE, Mr. LEWIS, Mr. LODGE, Mr. LOGAN, Mr. LONERGAN, Mr. LUNDEEN, Mr. MALONEY, Mr. McADOO, Mr. McCARRAN, Mr. McGILL, Mr. McKELLAR, Mr. McNARY, Mr. MINTON, Mr. MOORE, Mr. MURRAY, Mr. NEELY, Mr. NORRIS, Mr. NYE, Mr. O'MAHONEY, Mr. OVERTON, Mr. PEPPER, Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. POPE, Mr. RADCLIFFE, Mr. REYNOLDS, Mr. ROBINSON, Mr. RUSSELL, Mr. SCHWARTZ, Mr. SCHWELLENBACH, Mr. SHEPPARD, Mr. SHIPSTEAD, Mr. SMITH, Mr. STEIWER, Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma, Mr. THOMAS of Utah, Mr. TOWNSEND, Mr. TRUMAN, Mr. TYDINGS, Mr. VANDENBERG, Mr. VAN NUYS, Mr. WAGNER, Mr. WALSH, Mr. WHEELER, and Mr. WHITE):

A bill (S. 2067) authorizing the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service to control and prevent the spread of the disease of cancer, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

CAUSES OF AMERICAN PARTICIPATION IN WORLD WAR

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, in an editorial published in the Washington Post of this date, under the title "Twenty Years After", recalling our entrance into the World War 20 years ago, the conditions under which the United States took that momentous step, are so excellently presented that I think a statement of them should go into the RECORD.

I was a Member of the Senate at that time and voted in favor of the declaration of war as recommended by our then great President, Woodrow Wilson.

I have never read a better or more lucid statement than is contained in this editorial, of the reason why America entered that conflict. The writer, whoever he may be, has stated the case so much better, so much more clearly, and so much more forcefully than I could state it that I ask unanimous consent to have the editorial printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the editorial will be printed in the RECORD.

The editorial is as follows:

[From the Washington Post of Friday, Apr. 2, 1937]

TWENTY YEARS AFTER

Twenty years ago today, on April 2, 1917, President Wilson made his most momentous address to Congress, advising that body to declare "the recent course of the Imperial German Government to be in fact nothing less than war against the Government and people of the United States."

Two days later the Senate, by a vote of 82 to 6, and 4 days later the House, by a vote of 373 to 50, accepted for this country "the status of belligerent which has been thrust upon it." By proclamation of the President on April 6 the United States entered the World War. The consequences of that action are still with us.

It has become somewhat fashionable, of late, to assert that this historic step was a deviation from the desirable course of national destiny; to maintain that the blood and treasure expended by this country as a belligerent were utterly wasted; to emphasize the fact that the war did not, as President Wilson hoped, make the world safe for democracy, and to assume that the outcome would somehow have been more favorable for America had we swallowed the unbridled insults of the German Government and preserved a craven peace at any price.

On this solemn anniversary it is therefore appropriate to ask ourselves again whether, in that crisis of her history, America failed to fulfill the national ideals without which no people can be recorded as having contributed constructively to the long record of human evolution.

The pacific character of the American people; their aversion to war as a barbaric and fruitless method of settling controversies, was at least as pronounced two decades ago as is the case today. because of this civilized belief we had, for many months, patiently endured insults and aggressions from both the Germans and the Allies. And it was not until the German offenses assumed the characteristics, as Woodrow Wilson said, of "a warfare against mankind" that we reluctantly decided to put force behind the defense of those rights which the German submarine commanders so contemptuously flouted.

Whether or not this enforced defense of national rights actually achieved the idealistic objectives the Nation cherished is really a secondary question. To attain those objectives America did what she could, and failure to accomplish what in the event proved beyond our powers can never be held against us by mortal critics. But to our undying credit will stand the strict fulfillment of that pledge which was within our power to redeem. "We desire no conquest", said President Wilson 20 years ago today. "We seek no indemnities for ourselves, no material compensation for the sacrifices we shall freely make. We are but one of the champions of the rights of mankind."

From that promise the United States never deviated. And for this proof of altruistic purpose, as well as for the refusal to suffer continuous and intolerable aggression, the American people may continue to take legitimate pride. When the balance hung uncertain, when the issues trembled between vindication of honor or passive acceptance of indignity, the country took the course which the character of its people made inevitable.

None knows what might have happened had America stayed at peace. Perhaps Germany would have won the war. There are those who argue that present world conditions, had that been the outcome, would have been no worse. It is not a difficult argument to combat, but in such hypothetical discussion there is no gain for any debater.

What counts is that America, in the test, was not found wanting. The Nation, under President Wilson's leadership, was true to itself; true to its traditions, true to the conviction that a servile democracy is not worth saving and that, in the last analysis, the fundamental interests of the United States are inevitably opposed to the triumph of the autocratic principle. Thus it was 20 years ago. Thus, if circumstances pose the inescapable choice, it will be again.

"The right", said Woodrow Wilson on April 2, 1917, "is more precious than peace, and we shall fight for the things which we have always carried nearest our hearts." So it will continue to be, as long as Americans treasure the contribution this country has made to civilization and pride themselves upon a national ideal which cannot be measured in purely material terms.

President Wilson, secure from the criticism of lesser men, may sleep at peace in the quiet of the cathedral at Mount St. Albans. In the hour of trial he had the stature to realize how America had to choose. He knew, in his ringing paraphrase of Martin Luther's phrase, that "God helping her, she can do no other."

ROOSEVELT, LIBERALISM, AND THE COURTS—ADDRESS BY CHIEF JUSTICE RILEY, OF OKLAHOMA

[Mr. LEE asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD part of an address delivered by Chief Justice Fletcher Riley, of the Supreme Court of Oklahoma, at the Democratic victory dinner in Denver, Colo., on Mar. 4, 1937, on the subject, Roosevelt, Liberalism, and the Courts, which appears in the Appendix.]

REGULATION OF BITUMINOUS-COAL INDUSTRY

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 4985) to regulate interstate commerce in bituminous coal, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES].

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the pending amendment to the coal bill is the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] having relation to what we term the "sit-down strike", although the language of the amendment does not expressly refer to strikes.

I think there is a general feeling in the Senate that a subject matter of this importance, involving, as it does, many considerations touching sound public policy, should have the attention and thought of a standing committee of the Senate, and up to this time no committee of this body has been given jurisdiction of the subject matter of this amendment.

It is my information that a number of amendments, some of them in the nature of substitutes, are in contemplation by various Members of this body. In order that the many aspects of the questions underlying the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina may receive due consideration, I move that the amendment, with all amendments that may be offered thereto, be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, with instructions to report by resolution not later than 30 days.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield for a question?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. BYRNES. Should a resolution be reported from the committee, would the Senator from Arkansas, as majority leader, agree to make such resolution reported by the committee the unfinished business of the Senate?

Mr. ROBINSON. No, Mr. President; I would have no authority to enter into such an agreement now. If a resolution shall be reported, it will take its place on the calendar when it is so reported, and any Senator, including myself and the Senator from South Carolina, will be at liberty, if the condition of business in the Senate permits, to make a motion to proceed to the consideration of the resolution. I would be strongly disposed to make that motion at an opportune time. I will not say that I will agree to make the resolution the unfinished business, because I have not that authority.

Mr. BYRNES. I knew that the Senator did not have the authority. I simply wanted to know whether the Senator would be in favor of making the resolution the unfinished business?

Mr. ROBINSON. I should like to see the resolution which may be reported from the committee before I declare myself in favor of it.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. The statement made by the leader of the majority, of course, was correct in that if the resolution were reported and on the calendar, when that order was reached, if the Senate were proceeding under the rule, any Senator could move to make it the unfinished business; but the practice has been uniform in the last few years to consider the calendar for unobjected business. Therefore, one objection would stop a proposal of that kind. Consequently, under such procedure and practice the Senator from South Carolina would not get anywhere with his resolution if it were on the calendar.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator understands that on any Monday when the calendar is called under rule VIII, if objection is made to the consideration of a resolution or a bill, any Senator may then move to proceed to the consideration of such resolution or bill; and when the motion is carried, if it be carried, it makes the subject matter of legislation the unfinished business.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, that suggestion is also subject to a number of qualifications. In the first place, the Senate has not been proceeding under rule VIII for more than 2 years. Consequently, if a Senator should move on Monday morning during the call of the calendar to proceed to the consideration of an order on the calendar and make it the unfinished business its privilege would expire at 2 o'clock. So there you are again.

The VICE PRESIDENT. May the Chair be permitted to remark that the Senate, at any time after the conclusion of morning business, can take up a resolution or any other measure and make it the unfinished business of the Senate——

Mr. ROBINSON. By a majority vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. By a majority vote.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is what I was undertaking to say.

The VICE PRESIDENT. And under any agreement to report the resolution, if in the future the Senator from Arkansas or the Senator from South Carolina should approach the Chair and ask for recognition the Chair would have the power and would be inclined to give it if the opportunity was afforded.

Mr. ROBINSON. In good faith I intend that any resolution shall be considered by the Senate, should one be reported by the committee. I do not wish to commit myself to a resolution until I know what it is. I do not think it reasonable to ask any other course on my part.

I make the motion in the following form, and, of course, that motion is subject to debate.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am wondering whether the 30-day limitation is really fair to the committee. A good many members of the Committee on Interstate Commerce are also members of the Committee on the Judiciary, which is now considering the proposed judiciary reform bill. The chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce [Mr. WHEELER] is not in the Chamber at the moment, so I do not know just how the committee would feel about whether any hearings should be had and what consideration ought to be given to the resolution and whether they would be able to report within 30 days.

Mr. ROBINSON. It was and is my thought that if the committee should find itself unable to report within the limitation, its logical course would be to advise the Senate of that fact and ask for additional time. I did not feel justified in moving to refer the amendment to the committee without fixing some time for a report on the subject matter carried in the amendment. I have not asked unanimous consent. I do not ask unanimous consent. I submit the issue in the form of a motion, which is in order, and upon which the Senate will have a vote.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if the Senate is ready to vote on the motion, I do not desire to prolong the debate. I had expected to discuss the matter before the Senate; but if the Senate is ready to vote, I shall not proceed.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. KING. I think some others may desire to submit some observations. I advise the Senator of that fact so he may continue if he desires.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, whether the resolution or amendment was so intended or not, it has now been associated with the situation in the State of Michigan, and I do not think we can dispose of it without its having some bearing upon that situation. Therefore, I have felt I ought to say a few words in regard to the amendment.

I presume the logical way to proceed with the discussion of the subject is to determine in the first instance what, if any, authority the National Government has to deal with the situation. It might be that we would not care to adopt a resolution if we had no power to follow it up and to offer any plan or method by which to ameliorate the situation or to better the conditions in that State.

In my view, the sole authority to deal with the situation in the State of Michigan is the State of Michigan. Under the facts as we read them in the press and as they were presented here yesterday, I do not believe the National Government has any authority officially to proceed in the matter in any respect whatsoever. If we have not the power to effectuate our purposes, whatever they may be, then we ought consider whether we may not seriously embarrass the situation for those who must cope with the conditions now obtaining in that State.

It is a local matter in which citizens of the same State are having a controversy with reference to what they claim to be their rights, and therefore we are not in a position to follow up any resolution or amendment which may be adopted by any action whatever upon the part of the National Government.

The able Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] yesterday read a section from an act which was passed some years ago; I believe in 1870.

Mr. KING. In 1871.

Mr. BORAH. In that statute it was provided that under certain circumstances the National Government may proceed to restore order within a State. That section reads as follows:

> Whenever insurrection, domestic violence, unlawful combinations, or conspiracies in any State so obstructs or hinders the execution of the laws thereof, and of the United States, as to deprive any portion or class of the people of such State of any of the rights, privileges, or immunities, or protection named in the Constitution and secured by the laws for the protection of such rights, privileges, or immunities, and the constituted authorities of such State are unable to protect, or, from any cause, fail in or refuse protection of the people in such rights, such facts shall be deemed a denial by such State of the equal protection of the laws to which they are entitled under the Constitution of the United States; and in all such cases, or whenever any such insurrection, violence, unlawful combination, or conspiracy, opposes or obstructs the laws of the United States or the due execution thereof, or impedes or obstructs the due course of justice under the same, it shall be lawful for the President, and it shall be his duty, to take such measures, by the employment of the militia or the land and naval forces of the United States, or of either, or by other means, as he may deem necessary, for the suppression of such insurrection, domestic violence, or combinations.

In order that the President may have authority to proceed under that section it would have to be shown that rights, privileges, and immunities guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States or some law of the United States have been infringed or broken or violated. The statute, on its face, discloses it has no application to the proposition before us. That matter was pretty well settled by the Supreme Court in construing another section of the same act from which this section is quoted. In that case the Court passed upon this provision of the act:

> That is two or more persons shall band or conspire together, or go in disguise upon the public highway, or upon the premises of another, with intent to violate any provision of this act, or to injure, oppress, threaten, or intimidate any citizen, with intent to prevent or hinder his free exercise and enjoyment of any right or privilege granted or secured to him by the Constitution or laws of the United States, or because of his having exercised the same, such persons shall be held guilty of felony.

The Court held that that statute did not change the general rule that before the United States may enter a State and take charge of domestic violence there must be an infraction of the laws of the United States or an infraction of the guaranties of the Constitution with reference to the rights, privileges, and immunities of a citizen; that if there was a controversy between citizens or a controversy between groups of citizens, or if violence prevailed in the States by reason of controversies between citizens, then, until the Governor should ask the National Government to act, it would not be within the power of the National Government to enter the State. In this case the Court said:

> The government thus established and defined is to some extent a government of the States in their political capacity * * *. The people of the United States resident within any State are subject to two governments, one State and the other National; but there need be no conflict between the two. The powers which one possesses the other does not. They are established for different purposes and have separate jurisdictions. Together they make one whole, and furnish the people of the United States with a complete government, ample for the protection of all their rights at home and abroad.

Again the Court said:

> The charge as made is really of nothing more than a conspiracy to commit a breach of the peace within a State. Certainly it will not be claimed that the United States have the power or are required to do mere police duty in the States. If a State cannot protect itself against domestic violence, the United States may, upon the call of the Executive, when the Legislature cannot be convened, lend their assistance for that purpose. This is a guaranty of the Constitution (art. 4, sec. 4), but it applies to no case like this.

It is not contended that the State of Michigan, as a State, has proceeded in violation of the fourteenth amendment to deny protection to its citizens. The contention is that one citizen is infringing upon the rights of another citizen; that one citizen is seizing the property of another citizen; that violence may occur, or has occurred, by reason of that fact. The National Government, however, cannot interpose in conflicts between citizens unless the State government, either through the legislature or through the Governor, asks the National Government to do so. If the Governor of the State is unable to maintain law, to preserve peace, to put down domestic violence, and he so states to the National Government, or if his legislature so states to the National Government, the National Government then may go in and take charge of the situation; but not until that happens has the National Government any power whatever to proceed in the premises.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator see any analogy between the situation here presented and that which existed in Illinois, when Mr. Cleveland sent troops into Illinois for the purpose of preserving order and protecting the transportation of the mails?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Cleveland case and the Debs case turned entirely upon the proposition that force and violence were interfering with interstate commerce and interfering with the moving of the mails. It was upon that ground that the Supreme Court sustained the action of the State government. If it were claimed in this case, or if it could be shown in this matter, that the mails are being interfered with, or that crime is being committed upon the property of the United States, or that interstate commerce is being interfered with, then, of course, a wholly different question would arise. The National Government then would proceed to protect its own rights and its own interests in interstate commerce and in the mails. That I do not understand is contended; at least, I have seen no facts supporting that proposition.

Mr. BARKLEY. And the National Government would do so without the request of a Governor or a legislature. It would do so on its own responsibility.

Mr. BORAH. Certainly. If the national rights of the citizen, if the national immunities and the national privileges of the citizen as guaranteed by the Constitution are interfered with, the National Government does not have to wait upon the government of the State; but where there is a controversy between citizens of a State over matters such as are here involved, in my opinion, the National Government has no right to move in.

The responsibility for this situation rests solely upon the shoulders of the Governor of the State of Michigan. He is proceeding in his own way and according to his own judgment. We may or may not agree with him, but the responsibility is his, and he is responsible to the people of the State of Michigan. I do not feel justified in even impliedly criticizing the Governor for the manner in which he is dealing with the situation. He said in a radio address night before last:

> Put yourself in my place. If you were Governor of Michigan, would you authorize a plan which might very easily and almost certainly result in bloodshed, bitter and lasting animosity, and a deplorable situation which might very easily take years to correct?

The Governor must proceed according to his own lights and be responsible to his own people. In the meantime, Mr. President, the question we have been discussing here, the validity of sit-down strikes—in other words, the right of a citizen to seize the property of another and hold it—has not been ignored in the State of Michigan. The Governor has stated that he does not approve of the sit-down strike. The courts of the State of Michigan have held that it is illegal. The commonwealth of the State has gone on record that the strike is an illegal strike; that the strikers have no right to seize the property of another and hold it.

But, Mr. President, it is a condition and not a theory with which they are dealing. Notwithstanding the State claims that the sit-down strike is illegal, and that what the strikers are doing is invalid, nevertheless they have done it. The physical fact is there that the strikers are in physical possession of the property, and the sole question is how to adjust the controversy between the parties. It can be adjusted either through peaceful means, in the manner in which the Governor is proceeding, or force may be employed.

They are the only two methods of which I know. For myself, I should wish to exhaust all means of a peaceful nature before I should employ force. When force is employed the controversy really is not settled. The persons in possession may be ousted from the building, but the controversy is thereby intensified and embittered, and is by no means adjusted. These conditions, such as arise in conflict between labor and capital never present a single axiom of right or wrong. It is always true that conditions are such that mediation and adjustment must be employed; or force.

Mr. President, I do not suppose any one will contend that A, or a group of A's, has a right to seize the property of B and hold it. That such action is unlawful is fundamental in our system of government, and the State of Michigan has not abandoned that doctrine. Nevertheless, the problem remains with which the State government has to cope. So far as I am concerned, until Governor Murphy advises the National Government that he is unable to deal with the situation and that he desires the help of the National Government, I do not desire to possibly embarrass him by any action upon our part here in the Senate.

The question may be raised, "You say embarrass: How could it embarrass?"

Mr. President, some 30 years ago the State of Idaho had to contend with a situation far worse than that which now prevails in the State of Michigan. The great Coeur d'Alene mining region was in possession of the Western Federation of Miners.

They dominated the situation. They took possession of men and held them. They took possession of property and held it. They destroyed property as well as held property. Finally, the trouble resulted in the killing of some nonunion men and the destruction of a vast amount of property.

Our Governor was a member of a union; but he never deviated for a moment from his purpose to restore order and protect property and protect life in the State. During the time he was engaged in this effort, however, he was constantly embarrassed and constantly annoyed, and had the situation constantly intensified and embittered by reason of the advice or counsel or action of outside persons. The other House of Congress passed a resolution on the matter and started an investigation. Those things did nothing but intensify and embitter the situation and embarrass the State authorities. The time came when the Governor had to ask for the assistance of the National Government; but, outside of the assistance which he sought, all other activities upon the part of outside persons were but an annoyance to the Governor. I do not know what a legislative expression here would accomplish. I only know that the responsibility is upon the shoulders of another man and upon the great Commonwealth in which the actions are taking place; and until they indicate to me that they are not prepared to deal with the situation, so far as I am concerned I do not desire to interfere. Whether the proposal comes back here in one form or another, unless we confine it solely to matters of interstate commerce, or to those matters over which we unquestionably have jurisdiction, I should be opposed to adopting anything without the request of the Governor of the State involved.

Mr. President, let me now enter into a little broader field. Really, according to the showing which has been made here, this matter is of much less consequence than I had at first supposed. I read from the very interesting letter which the able Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] read, coming from the mayor of Detroit. The mayor says:

> The general public is deeply affected by the situation, and all reputable citizens desire that labor receive an adequate wage and enjoy happy and proper working conditions. But, in my opinion, they do not approve of the manner in which most of these sit-down strikes have been called.

Then the Senator from Michigan comments:

> This letter emphasizes what I am saying—that this problem rises to its major menace, not within union labor, but on the outside of it, among those who rush to the opportunity to enjoy the privilege of violence when they would not dare do it upon their own responsibility.

In other words, we are dealing not with union labor or organized labor so much as with the hoodlums and the chronic law violators who flock to a scene like that as buzzards flock to a carcass. But has not the State power to deal with the individuals who are proposing to violate the law and create violence within the State? Has not the State the police power, and the criminal statutes, and the militia, and the courts? They have not yet broken down. It is certainly a proposition not necessarily of dealing with union labor itself in its organized effort, but rather of dealing with those who are always on the verge of violating the laws of the country.

Again, Mayor Couzens says:

> I believe that a great deal could be accomplished toward this end if you were to request and urge the President and Congress to use their efforts to terminate sit-down strikes and to bring about proper methods of settling such labor disputes.

I do not know any way by which we can bring to an end the sit-down strike. Perhaps the mayor had in mind some idea on the subject, but he did not reduce it to writing. It goes back to the proposition of who has the power. The mayor of the city of Detroit has the power to enforce the law against individual violators of the law; and the Governor of the State has the power, and may summon every citizen of the State to his aid to enforce the laws of his State. In his way, and according to his method, he is proceeding to adjust the matter, if possible, without the use of force.

Perhaps I might close my remarks at this point, but I do desire to say a word further.

I confess that I have not been excited over the fact that in its struggle with capital labor has seized property; and this remark does not imply for a moment that I do not think the Government must protect property. It will protect property. But when there is a situation such as that which exists at this time, it is not possible to separate and segregate the sole question of property from a condition which involves human rights. In this long struggle property has many, many times been destroyed. Such action certainly was in violation of the law, and nobody conceded that those guilty had any right to do any such thing. Property seized at this time is seized in violation of the law, and no one concedes that those seizing it have a right to do so. But, as I said a moment ago, they have seized it, and without conceding that they have any right to do so, the Governor of the State where this is occurring desires to adjudicate the situation by peaceful means rather than by force.

Have we any objection to that proceeding? Are we ready to say that the Governor is not proceeding along right lines? What can we do to assist the Governor in the course he is now pursuing? I presume that if there were anything we could do the Governor would advise us of that fact.

Mr. President, 126 years ago, and I think it was in April, a case was presented in the courts of the State of New York. There had been an indictment of three cord wainers because they agreed together to quit work and because they agreed together to ask an increase of wages. They were indicted for conspiracy, tried in the court, and convicted.

We have traveled far since that time. It is now established in our law and in our courts that labor has a right to organize, to bring together men in the form of unions; that it is not only their right to do so but is their duty to do so; that they have a right to quit work and agree to quit work; that they have a right to demand an increase of wages; that they have a right to strike; that they have a right to picket; that they have a right to bargain collectively; and, in my opinion, before we shall have established tranquillity in the industrial world, we will arrive at the point where we will determine that a laborer has a right to his job.

In this long struggle countless things have been done which the law did not recognize, and the law does not recognize what the sit-down strikers are doing; but it is a part of the struggle which has been going on for a hundred years, and we cannot empirically say that the Governor of the State is not adjusting the matter in accordance with law and ethics. Perhaps there will come out of it a real settlement, a real adjustment and agreement among the parties as to their rights; but if force is employed, we cannot expect any such result, and the controversy will continue indefinitely. I am prepared to leave the matter entirely to the Governor of the State until he shall notify us that he wants our help.

Abraham Lincoln said that labor is the superior of capital, and much more entitled to high consideration. He did not mean, undoubtedly, that labor had a right to seize property, but he did mean that in the struggle for the rights of labor we must take into consideration the conditions and situations of the men who are contending for their rights. We must take into consideration that they see the struggle from another viewpoint from that from which we see it. If the Governor of Michigan can bring the men to realize that they must adjust their controversies in order to secure better rights, it is for the Governor to do so without our interference. If the time comes when the Governor feels he must appeal to the Federal Government, then this body will be within its line of duty to express its views and in doing so cannot possibly embarrass those who now have the responsibility.

Mr. MINTON and Mr. VANDENBERG addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I desire to make a point of order against the motion of the Senator from Arkansas.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BYRNES. I make the point of order that it is not in order to move to refer to a committee an amendment to a pending bill, and I cite the Chair to a decision of the Senate in 1906, when a motion was made by Mr. Hopkins to refer an amendment to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

I submit to the Chair also a more recent decision of the presiding officer, at that time the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY]. In 1935 the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. Long] offered an amendment—

> To insert * * * the following: "to enable the Congress to secure such information as may be necessary for the consideration and enactment of legislation."

The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] made the point of order that the pending resolution having previously been considered by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, the amendment should be referred to that committee, to be passed upon by it.

The then presiding officer, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], overruled the point of order made by the Senator from Tennessee, and said:

> The Chair holds that when an amendment to a pending resolution is offered the amendment is not referred to the committee, but it is voted upon as an amendment to the resolution.

In the case in 1906 the Senate itself voted upon the question, and by a vote of 48 to 25 decided that a motion to refer an amendment to a committee was not in order.

On the precedents of the Senate, I submit the question to the Chair.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair had recognized the Senator from Indiana before the Senator from South Carolina made his point of order. The Chair did not ask the Senator from Indiana whether he yielded for that purpose or not.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I did not know that the Chair had recognized the Senator from Indiana. I thought the Chair had recognized the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], who took his seat, and that was when I made the point of order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Indiana yield?

Mr. MINTON. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think it is in order to raise a point of order——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks a point of order can be made at any time, but doubts whether a Senator can be taken off his feet in order to make a point of order.

Mr. ROBINSON. No; and I do not think the Senator from South Carolina desired to do that.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I have stated that I did not so desire.

Mr. ROBINSON. I will not at this time reply to the statement of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator from Indiana yield to me?

Mr. MINTON. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Would it interfere with the Senator's purpose if he were to permit me for a brief moment to comment on some of the references made by the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] to the observations I made last evening?

Mr. MINTON. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I do not intend to repeat what I said upon yesterday, but I am very anxious to keep the issue where I think it belongs.

I did not bring the pending amendment to the bar of the Senate. It was not brought here by the action of anyone from Michigan; but when it reached the bar of the Senate I found myself in no position other than to face it, and because of its implications I continue to believe that it must be faced for the sake of candor and for the sake of all concerned, including labor.

Mr. President, the able Senator from Idaho says that the Senate should not express itself upon anything with which it does not have the authentic power to deal. I think that is probably an excellent rule; but while I have no specific instances in mind, I am perfectly sure that if I had the time I could develop the fact that the Senate frequently has resolved upon problems concerning which it did nothing but resolve and could do nothing but resolve.

The able Senator from Idaho has undertaken to suggest that this problem is exclusively a Michigan problem, and it is that to which I particularly desire to address myself, with the permission of the Senator from Indiana, before the debate continues.

I do not consider that this is a Michigan problem exclusively by any manner of means. In the first place, it is an interlocking interstate problem because of the effect of the closure of operating units in Michigan upon operating units in other States.

In the second place, it is clearly demonstrated that it is not purely a local question by the fact that the Governor of North Carolina has found it necessary to offer a specific public warning on the subject, that the Governor of Connecticut has found it necessary to offer a specific public warning on the question, and that the Governor of New Jersey similarly has found it necessary to speak. It transcends local jurisdictions, it seems to me, and cannot appropriately be brought back exclusively to a local Michigan question. Indeed, the pending proposal is not submitted from Michigan at all. It comes from the Senator from South Carolina, and relates to the production of coal in which Michigan is but incidentally concerned.

Now just one other comment. The address of the able Senator from Idaho would seem to indicate that the issue is drawn, upon the one hand, between condoning the sit-down strike and leaving the trespassers in possession of the property, or, on the other hand, shooting them out of the plants. I want emphatically to deny that those are the alternatives, and I with particular emphasis state that no such alternatives have ever been in my mind.

I do not think it is either necessary or wise to shoot anybody out of anything at the present situation. My point is, as demonstrated by the Chrysler employees themselves, when within the last week to their credit they voluntarily left the plants after a sit-down of perhaps 2 weeks. My point is that when they are given the authentic leadership which demonstrates to them that they ought not to persist in this trespass, that there is an immediate peaceful settlement of the situation. And the only point that I am stressing is that now that the point has been raised and rests here at the bar of the Senate, this is our opportunity—not to order a Federal intervention in Michigan—I have no remote thought of such a thing, and I would resent it, but that it is our opportunity to express that moral leadership which the situation seems to require. The double necessity for expression on the part of the Federal Government at last through some department of the Government, I respectfully submit, is emphasized by the fact that the silence of the Government is being misconstrued in many quarters as an assent to the illegal trespass which is now going on, not merely in Michigan but wherever the sit-down technique persists.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. MINTON. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. As I understand, the Senator from Michigan thinks that the situation can be peacefully adjusted?

Mr. VANDENBERG. If the Senator from Indiana will yield to me to reply to the Senator from Idaho, I will say that I most emphatically think it can be peacefully adjusted, except as respects the hoodlumism that comes in from the outside.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, that is a question of mere police administration. If the State of Michigan cannot take care of its problem of hoodlumism then the State of Michigan is much less of a commonwealth than I had supposed it to be.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, while we have used "hoodlumism" as a word to define what is going on there now, there is a far more important influence coming in from the outside. There is an infiltration of subversive influences—a situation which I could clearly prove to the Senator if I were permitted the time to do so.

Mr. BORAH. I simply repeat that the processes which are being employed by the Governor of the State of Michigan seem to me to be identical with those which the Senator from Michigan seems to think ought to be employed.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I have not specifically criticized the Governor of Michigan, and I do not intend to do so. I realize what it means for a man to confront the responsibility we are discussing. I am not worrying about the responsibility of the Governor of the State of Michigan. He will attend to that himself. That is his business, for which he is answerable to his people. I am worrying about the responsibility of United States Senators who confront a challenge to speak their minds upon this problem and who apparently are preparing not to do so.

Mr. JOHNSON of California rose.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I beg the Senator's pardon. Has the Senator from Indiana the floor?

Mr. MINTON. I have the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Then, of course, I will not proceed.

Mr. MINTON. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator if he wishes to reply to what has been said.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. No, Mr. President. I wish to express myself in my own way.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has directed our attention very forcefully to what our duties as a Congress may be and what our responsibilities are in regard to the sit-down strike. I do not intend to discuss the legality or illegality of the sit-down strike. Within my limitations as a lawyer I know of no law that justifies the sit-down strike. It has been pointed out as a violation of the law of property, as a trespass. I could not but say that I am in favor of the law against trespass. But, Mr. President, I wish to discuss for a few minutes the responsibility of another in this situation, and I am prompted to do so because of the statements that were made in the closing hours of the session yesterday by the distinguished senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] and the distinguished senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], whereby they laid on the doorstep of the White House the charge that the President of the United States was derelict in the performance of his duty.

Mr. President, no more courageous man at any time, any place, ever represented a people than the courageous Senator from California; and because of his brave and generous nature I know that he would not, wittingly or unwittingly, say anything that might be construed to reflect unfairly upon another. So I entertain the hope that when I shall have concluded my discussion of his observations and the statute cited by him yesterday he will turn again his fine legal mind to a consideration of that statute in the light of the authority I shall cite.

Mr. President, before I discuss the act cited by the Senator from California I wish first to address a few remarks to the statement of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG]. I want to say that in his remarks yesterday he was, for the most part, extremely fair to the President of the United States, and I commend him for his fairness and generosity in his statement. But I think the Senator from Michigan made a statement, which has probably been heralded to the country, that did charge the President unfairly in this matter, and that was his impassioned plea that "silence gives consent." The Senator from Michigan cited in the course of his remarks certain statements made by those who purported to represent the workers in the factories in Michigan to the effect that the President of the United States wanted them to seize people's property and to take charge of this, that, and the other, and do the things which they were doing in the sit-down strike.

I desire to make a statement, and I believe the Senator from Michigan will agree with me about it, because I think I gathered from his remarks that he did not consider that those statements came from any genuine and sincere leader of the labor forces or any sincere worker in the ranks of labor. Men who have been fighting the battle of labor for these many years know that that kind of propaganda emanates from the enemies of labor who are often strewn throughout the plants in which they work by those who employ them; that that is the propaganda of stool pigeons and persons who are too often placed in the plant by the employer to spy upon the sincere and honest worker in the plant. I wish to say to the Senate that, in my judgment, the time has not come when the President of the United States is bound to take notice of and deny the statements of irresponsible radical persons who would embroil labor, and statements made by stool pigeons who are placed in the plants of industry in this country by the employers. So I say, Mr. President, that silence does not give consent. When there is no duty to speak there is no consent given by silence to anything.

Mr. President, when may the President of the United States invade the sovereign State of Michigan? The President of the United States, as I conceive, is not a roving policeman to intrude himself into each and every difficulty that may arise in the States of the United States. He is the high executive officer of the Federal Government, charged with the responsibility of enforcing the law of this country, and that law is found in the Constitution and the statutes enacted in pursuance to the Constitution.

With what does the Constitution of the United States charge the President of the United States? By section 4 of article 4 of the Constitution of the United States the President is authorized to use the armed forces within the domestic limits of the United States, and that section reads as follows:

The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government—

I know that the Senator from Michigan does not charge that a republican form of government no longer exists in the State of Michigan—and shall protect each of them against invasion—

I have heard no voice anywhere at any time charging that the great sovereign State of Michigan has been invaded; but Senators, mark this provision—and on application of the legislature, or of the executive (when the legislature cannot be convened) against domestic violence.

That alone is the authority for the President of the United States to intrude into the sovereign State of Michigan with the armed forces of the United States; when the State of Michigan, as the distinguished Senator from Idaho so well pointed out, shall ask that it be done because there exists domestic violence in the State which the State cannot control.

How goes it with the State of Michigan today? The Senator from Michigan referred to a letter from the son of a beloved Senator from Michigan, the late Senator Couzens. How goes it with the city of Detroit, the great city presided over by Mr. Couzens? Has Mr. Couzens said, "I cannot carry on my duties as mayor of the city of Detroit; I cannot enforce the law"? Not at all. Even in the communication read to the Senate yesterday by the Senator from Michigan, the mayor of the great city of Detroit showed conclusively that he was master of the situation in Detroit. I quote from his letter where he pointed out that some irresponsible persons had taken charge of and raided the property of Frank & Seder and sat down in the store of this concern. He said:

I left the meeting and sent several hundred police officers to the Frank & Seder store, where we technically held everyone until testimony, affidavits, etc., could be secured. I remained at the store for hours and listened to the testimony (of employees).

So the mayor of the city of Detroit was in command of the city of Detroit. If the mayor of Detroit cannot handle the situation, let him stand forth and say so.

How goes it with the sheriff of Wayne County, Mich., who is charged with law enforcement in the county of Wayne and the execution of writs of the courts entrusted to his office? He has never come forth, so far as I know, and said that he could not execute the duties of his office. As the distinguished Senator from Idaho pointed out a while ago, he may swear in a posse comitatus of the entire county to enforce the processes of the courts of which he is the executive officer. Who says that he has made such a call and that such a call has not been heeded? If the sheriff of Wayne County claims that he can no longer run the office of sheriff of Wayne County, let him stand forth and say so.

How goes it with the great State of Michigan itself? Has the Governor of the State of Michigan said that he could not handle the situation? Senators who know Governor Murphy well, as I know him only slightly, will all agree that he is a brave, courageous, highly intelligent citizen and a fine Governor, and, with the Senator from Idaho, I agree that he is doing a splendid job in trying to settle by peaceful means the strike situation in the city of Detroit. Has the great Governor of Michigan said he cannot maintain law and order in Michigan, or called upon the President for help? Until he does, the President has no authority to act.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

Mr. MINTON. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. BAILEY. The mayor of Detroit and the Governor of Michigan have not said that they could not handle the situation, but actions speak louder than words. They have not handled it; that is the fact.

Mr. MINTON. But there must be action, there must be word coming from the Governor of Michigan or the Legislature of Michigan, before the President of the United States is authorized to invade the sovereignty of the State of Michigan.

Mr. BAILEY. I am not raising that point, but I am simply raising the point that the Governor of Michigan manifestly is not in command in Michigan and the mayor of Detroit manifestly is not in command in Detroit, and I think everybody in America knows it.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Indiana yield to me?

Mr. MINTON. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, what has been disturbing me, and I should like to have the Senator straighten it out for me, is where Michigan becomes involved in this amendment. I have heard discussion after discussion indicating that somewhere pending before the body is a measure by which we were planning to condemn the Governor of Michigan or the mayor of Detroit or to send Federal troops into Michigan or to use Federal authority there, and I want to know if I have been reading the wrong measure.

Mr. MINTON. Let me say to the Senator——

Mr. ADAMS. I hope the Senator will let me complete the statement.

Mr. MINTON. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMS. I have before me on my desk the coal bill, a measure which looks forward, an effort, as I understand, to establish peaceful means for settling controversies in the coal industry. We are taking the position, as we did on a previous occasion, that the coal industry is charged with such a public interest that the intervention of the Federal Government is justified in its concerns. That has nothing to do with the automobile business. In the bill which is before us we declare definitely in favor of collective bargaining; we declare definitely that there shall be no interference on the part of the employer with collective bargaining and with the organization of the employees in the coal industry. We are looking forward, not back. Perhaps we are learning a lesson from Michigan, but I am unable to see how Michigan is involved in this controversy. The simple fact is, as I understand—and if I am wrong, I should like to be corrected—that we propose to say that it is the policy of the United States as to the coal industry that there shall be collective bargaining; that there shall be the right to organize; and we at the same time say to the men granted that right that if the employer denies that right and stands out and refuses to permit collective bargaining, the men should not take possession of the plants, thus granting one right, that the other should follow.

I heard Mr. Lewis not long ago make a declaration to the effect that the so-called sit-down strike was solely for the purpose and would be used for no other purpose than to secure the right of collective bargaining——

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, I cannot yield to the Senator to make a speech in my time, much as I should like to hear him.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MINTON. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Where Michigan comes into the equation is that this amendment is aimed at the automobile workers in Michigan through the coal miners.

Mr. MINTON. I thank the Senator for his observation.

Mr. President, as I was saying when interrupted, the time arrives when the President of the United States may invade the sovereign State of Michigan only, as I have pointed out, when the Constitution authorizes him so to do. As the Senator from Idaho pointed out, in the case of United States against Cruikshank, the Supreme Court has upheld that construction of the provision of the Constitution. So I say to the Senate that the President of the United States up to now, under his constitutional obligations, has not been required to speak; and again I say that silence does not give consent, because where there is no duty to speak silence does not give consent to anything.

Now, Mr. President, I direct my attention to the statute read by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] yesterday. The statute, as the Senator from Idaho pointed out, is one of the statutes, commonly called the civil-rights bills, which were passed following the Civil War for the purpose of guaranteeing to the newly made citizens of the Negro race the benefits of citizenship in the country whose citizenship they had just received.

It was in an effort to protect the colored race against discrimination and against the unfair application of laws to them that the fourteenth amendment was enacted and these statutes were passed, but, of course, the amendment envisaged more territory than that and has, of course, received a wider construction than application solely to the Negro race. But, Mr. President, the fourteenth amendment that is sought to be enforced by the act cited by the Senator from California does not grant to the Federal authority of the United States the right to act directly and to redress wrongs to individual rights committed by another individual. The fourteenth amendment, in which these constitutional guaranties are embodied, provides that such guaranties shall stand against action by the States. In other words, the fourteenth amendment is a prohibitory amendment, preventing action by the States that would deny to citizens of the United States privileges and immunities and the equal protection of the laws.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

Mr. MINTON. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. BAILEY. I merely wish to express the hope that the Senator now speaking will take the same position when the antilynching bill comes before the Senate.

Mr. MINTON. When the antilynching bill comes before the Senate I will take my position with the welfare of the country at heart, and cast my vote accordingly, and under my oath as a Senator, according to the law as I understand it; but if the tactics pursued by the Senator from North Carolina are to be followed I think the antilynching bill will never come before the Senate.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I hope that I may be again successful.

Mr. MINTON. So, Mr. President, as I have said, the fourteenth amendment is a prohibition against action by the States and does not purport to authorize the Federal Government to place its protecting arm around every individual in the United States and protect each and every individual against the invasion of his rights by another individual.

The fourteenth amendment is directed at the action or failure to act by States, and such failure to act, before it can come within the purview of the violation of the Constitution, must be a failure in such a way as to discriminate against someone's constitutional rights, guaranteed by the Constitution, or so utterly to deny them as to make it perfectly apparent that the enforcing officers of the State have no intention to enforce it on behalf of the people it was intended to protect.

Mr. President, that question came before the Supreme Court a number of times in construing this constitutional provision, and I can add nothing more to what has been said than, after I have read the statute, to read one of the great decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. I wish now to call attention to the statute cited by the Senator from California:

Whenever insurrection, domestic violence, unlawful combinations, or conspiracies in any State so obstructs or hinders the execution of the laws thereof, and of the United States, as to deprive any portion or class of the people of such State of any of the rights, privileges, or immunities, or protection named in the Constitution and secured by the laws for the protection of such rights, privileges, or immunities, and the constituted authorities—and the constituted authorities of such State are unable to protect, or, from any cause, fail in or refuse protection of the people in such rights, such facts shall be deemed a denial by such State of the equal protection of the laws to which they are entitled under the Constitution of the United States.

Mark you this—

That is the first part of the statute. Senators will see by the broad provisions of the statute itself that it is directed at State action or State inaction and not individual action at all.

Then we come to the second part of the statute:

And in all such cases—

Referring to the cases I have just mentioned—

And in all such cases, or whenever any such insurrection, violence, unlawful combination, or conspiracy opposes or obstructs the laws of the United States, or the due execution thereof, or impedes or obstructs the due course of justice under the same, it shall be lawful for the President, and it shall be his duty, to take such measures, by the employment of the militia or the land and naval forces of the United States, or of either, or by other means, as he may deem necessary, for the suppression of such insurrection, domestic violence, or combinations.

Senators will observe that that provision is directed at a violation of acts of Congress.

As the Senator from Idaho pointed out, in the sit-down strike situation no one has observed that the laws of the United States enacted under the Constitution of the United States were not being enforced; so the latter part of the provision of the act which I have just read, under the facts in this case, could have no application. The first part of the statute I have read can have no application to the sit-down strike, for the reason that the sit-down strike is a matter of one individual's rights against another individual; for instance, the employee stays in the factory and holds possession of his employer's property. That involves the rights of the employee and the employer. That is an individual matter between the employee and the employer. That is not protected by the prohibition of the fourteenth amendment. It is State action or inaction that is prohibited.

With that preliminary, I can do no better than to read from the great case decided by the Supreme Court in 1883 in which it was construing at that time the very acts which were known as the civil-rights bills. I refer to the Civil Rights case, decided in One Hundred and Ninth United States Reports, beginning at page 1; and I shall start reading at page 10. Mr. Justice Bradley, who delivered the opinion of the Court, said:

The first section of the fourteenth amendment, which is relied on—

The statute which was under consideration by the Court at that time sought to protect individuals against the violation of constitutional rights by another individual—

The first section of the fourteenth amendment (which is the one relied on), after declaring who shall be citizens of the United States and of the several States, is prohibitory in its character and prohibitory upon the States. It declares that—

"No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

It is State action of a particular character that is prohibited. Individual invasion of individual rights is not the subject matter of the amendment. It has a deeper and broader scope. It nullifies and makes void all State legislation and State action of every kind which impairs the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States or which injures them in life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or which denies to any of them the equal protection of the laws. It not only does this, but, in order that the national will, thus declared, may not be a mere brutum fulmen, the last section of the amendment invests Congress with power to enforce it by appropriate legislation. To enforce what? To enforce the prohibition. To adopt appropriate legislation for correcting the effects of such prohibited State laws and State acts, and thus to render them effectually null, void, and innocuous. This is the legislative power conferred upon Congress, and this is the whole of it. It does not invest Congress with power to legislate upon subjects which are within the domain of State legislation but to provide modes of relief against State legislation or State action of the kind referred to. It does not authorize Congress to create a code of municipal law for the regulation of private rights but to provide modes of redress against the operation of State laws and the action of State officers, executive or judicial, when these are subversive of the fundamental rights specified in the amendment. Positive rights and privileges are undoubtedly secured by the fourteenth amendment, but they are secured by way of prohibition against State laws and State proceedings affecting those rights and privileges, and by power given to Congress to legislate for the purpose of carrying such prohibition into effect; and such legislation must necessarily be predicated upon such supposed State laws or State proceedings, and be directed to the correction of their operation and effect.

* * * * * * * *

And so in the present case, until some State law has been passed, or some State action through its officers or agents has been taken, adverse to the rights of citizens sought to be protected by the fourteenth amendment, no legislation of the United States under said amendment, nor any proceeding under such legislation, can be called into activity: for the prohibitions of the amendment are against State laws and acts done under State authority. Of course, legislation may, and should be, provided in advance to meet the exigency when it arises; but it should be adapted to the mischief and wrong which the amendment was intended to provide against; and that is, State laws, or State action of some kind, adverse to the rights of the citizen secured by the amendment. Such legislation cannot properly cover the whole domain of rights appertaining to life, liberty, and property, defining them and providing for their vindication. That would be to establish a code of municipal law regulative of all private rights between man and man in society. It would be to make Congress take the place of the State legislatures and to supersede them. It is absurd to affirm that, because the rights of life, liberty, and property (which include all civil rights that men have), are by the amendment sought to be protected against invasion on the part of the State without due process of law, Congress may therefore provide due process of law for their vindication in every case; and that, because the denial by a State to any persons of the equal protection of the laws, is prohibited by the amendment, therefore Congress may establish laws for their equal protection. In fine, the legislation which Congress is authorized to adopt in this behalf is not general legislation upon the rights of the citizen, but corrective legislation; that is, such as may be necessary and proper for counteracting such laws as the States may adopt or enforce, and which, by the amendment, they are prohibited from making or enforcing, or such acts and proceedings as the States may commit or take, and which, by the amendment, they are prohibited from committing or taking * * *.

An inspection of the law shows that it makes no reference whatever to any supposed or apprehended violation of the fourteenth amendment on the part of the States. It is not predicated on any such view. It proceeds ex directo to declare that certain acts committed by individuals shall be deemed offenses, and shall be prosecuted and punished by proceedings in the courts of the United States. It does not profess to be corrective of any constitutional wrong committed by the States; it does not make its operation to depend upon any such wrong committed. It applies equally to cases arising in States which have the justest laws respecting the personal rights of citizens, and whose authorities are ever ready to enforce such laws, as to those which arise in States that may have violated the prohibition of the amendment. In other words, it steps into the domain of local jurisprudence, and lays down rules for the conduct of individuals in society toward each other, and imposes sanctions for the enforcement of those rules, without referring in any manner to any supposed action of the State or its authorities.

If this legislation is appropriate for enforcing the prohibitions of the amendment, it is difficult to see where it is to stop. Why may not Congress, with equal show of authority, enact a code of laws for the enforcement and vindication of all rights of life, liberty, and property? If it is supposable that the States may deprive persons of life, liberty, and property without due process of law (and the amendment itself does suppose this), why should not Congress proceed at once to prescribe due process of law for the protection of every one of these fundamental rights, in every possible case, as well as to prescribe equal privileges in inns, public conveyances, and theaters? The truth is that the implication of a power to legislate in this manner is based upon the assumption that if the States are forbidden to legislate or act in a particular way on a particular subject, and power is conferred upon Congress to enforce the prohibition, this gives Congress power to legislate generally upon that subject, and not merely power to provide modes of redress against such State legislation or action. The assumption is certainly unsound. It is repugnant to the tenth amendment of the Constitution, which declares that powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people.

We have not overlooked the fact that the fourth section of the act now under consideration has been held by this Court to be constitutional. That section declares "that no citizen, possessing all other qualifications which are or may be prescribed by law, shall be disqualified for service as grand or petit juror in any court of the United States, or of any State, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; and any officer or other person charged with any duty in the selection or summoning of jurors who shall exclude or fail to summon any citizen for the cause aforesaid, shall, on conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be fined not more than $5,000." In Ex parte Virginia (100 U. S. 339), it was held that an indictment against a State officer under this section for excluding persons of color from the jury list is sustainable. But a moment's attention to its terms will show that the section is entirely corrective in its character. Disqualifications for service on juries are only created by the law, and the first part of the section is aimed at certain disqualifying laws; namely, those which make mere race or color a disqualification; and the second clause is directed against those who, assuming to use the authority of the State government, carry into effect such a rule of disqualification. In the Virginia case the State, through its officer, enforced a rule of disqualification which the law was intended to abrogate and counteract. Whether the statute book of the State actually laid down any such rule of disqualification or not, the State, through its officer, enforced such a rule; and it is against such State action, through its officers and agents, that the last clause of the section is directed.

* * * * * * *

In this connection it is proper to state that civil rights, such as are guaranteed by the Constitution against State aggression, cannot be impaired by the wrongful acts of individuals, unsupported by State authority in the shape of laws, customs, or judicial or executive proceedings. The wrongful act of an individual, unsupported by any such authority, is simply a private wrong or a crime of that individual; an invasion of the rights of the injured party, it is true, whether they affect his person, his property, or his reputation; but if not sanctioned in some way by the State or not done under State authority, his rights remain in full force and may presumably be vindicated by resort to the laws of the State for redress. An individual cannot deprive a man of his right to vote, to hold property, to buy and sell, to sue in the courts, or to be a witness or a juror; he may, by force or fraud, interfere with the enjoyment of the right in a particular case; he may commit an assault against the person, or commit murder, or use ruffian violence at the polls, or slander the good name of a fellow citizen; but, unless protected in these wrongful acts by some shield of State law or State authority, he cannot destroy or injure the right; he will only render himself amenable to satisfaction or punishment, and amenable therefor to the laws of the State where the wrongful acts are committed. Hence in all those cases where the Constitution seeks to protect the rights of the citizen against discriminative and unjust laws of the State by prohibiting such laws, it is not individual offenses, but abrogation and denial of rights, which it denounces, and for which it clothes the Congress with power to provide a remedy. This abrogation and denial of rights, for which the States alone were or could be responsible, was the great seminal and fundamental wrong which was intended to be remedied. And the remedy to be provided must necessarily be predicated upon that wrong. It must assume that in the cases provided for the evil or wrong actually committed rests upon some State law or State authority for its excuse and perpetration.

Of course, these remarks do not apply to those cases in which Congress is clothed with direct and plenary powers of legislation over the whole subject, accompanied with an express or implied denial of such power to the States, as in the regulation of commerce with foreign nations, among the several States, and with the Indian tribes, the coining of money, the establishment of post offices and post roads, the declaring of war, etc. In these cases Congress has power to pass laws for regulating the subjects specified in every detail, and the conduct and transactions of individuals in respect thereof. But where a subject is not submitted to the general legislative power of Congress, but is only submitted thereto for the purpose of rendering effective some prohibition against particular State legislation or State action in reference to that subject, the power given is limited by its object, and any legislation by Congress in the matter must necessarily be corrective in its character, adapted to counteract and redress the operation of such prohibited State laws or proceedings of State officers.

Mr. President, what would the great Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] have to say if the President of the United States, without call from the authorities in Michigan, had intruded himself into the sovereign State of Michigan? He would have been the first one to challenge the right and power of the President to intrude into the State of Michigan.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MINTON. Certainly.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I do not understand that the Senator from Michigan wants the President of the United States to go into Michigan or send any troops there. What he desires is that the President shall conduct a public prayer meeting against the sit-down strike and go no further than that. That is my understanding of what the Senator said here.

Mr. MINTON. I think the Senator's observations are pertinent and probably correct.

I shall not burden the Senate by reading further from this great opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, but I commend it to the thoughtful attention of Senators who are interested in the consideration of the statute called to our attention by the distinguished Senator from California.

I say, on the authority of the Civil Rights case from which I have just read, that the statute cited by the Senator from California does not touch the sit-down strike at all, and does not, as the Senator from California said in his impassioned plea of yesterday afternoon, charge the President of the United States with responsibility under that act, because the situation in the State of Michigan, as the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] pointed out—and I beg leave to invite the attention of Senators to that point again—is that one individual, if any wrong has been committed, has invaded the rights of another individual, and that under the authority of the Supreme Court of the United States, the authority of which has never been questioned, the Constitution of the United States does not throw the arm of the Federal Government around such individual to protect him against the invasion of his rights by another individual, but that amendment only seeks to prohibit some action by the States, some governor, or some court or some State authority, which would deny to a citizen of the United States his privileges and immunities guaranteed under the Constitution or deny him the equal protection of the laws.

With these observations I commend to the consideration of Senators the authorities I have cited, and assert that the authority cited by the distinguished Senator from California yesterday is no authority at all to charge the President of the United States with action as a representative of the Federal authority in the sit-down strike situation.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, a very simple question has been tortured into a constitutional argument by the constitutional lawyers of the Senate. "A very simple question", say I, because it is simply whether a statement of policy shall be voted by this body concerning the sit-down strike.

It is all right if men here oppose the sit-down strike. It is all right if men here favor the sit-down strike. Every man in this body is answerable to his own conscience, and every man may exercise his right just as he sees fit; but we all ought to have the nerve, when the question comes before us, to stand up before the gun and vote upon the particular question. So I trust that the motion of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] will not prevail, but that all of us, even those who are bad constitutional lawyers, as well as those who are good constitutional lawyers, may be required to vote upon the simple question. There is not anything wrong in that, and there is not anything requiring a particular kind of denunciation.

I have heard the plea—eloquent, indeed—of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] presented here today. I have heard that eloquent plea regarding the troubles of labor for many years in the past, until today they have reached their glorious state. I have heard him use that plea as a justification of a sit-down strike, and as a reason for voting against, I presume, this particular amendment.

The Senator from Idaho may have that view. It is his right to have that view. I have no right to question it or to quarrel with it; but, so help me God, as one Member of this body, as one individual charged with the duty of voting under his conscience, I want to vote today, and I want to vote against sit-down strikes.

That is the problem that is at issue here; not the question of whether or not a statute is constitutional. The statute I cited yesterday stands today unscathed by the remarks of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] or the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MINTON]. It is still a statute of the United States. Until last night apparently nobody in this Chamber knew that there was such a statute; and there was hurrying and scurrying last night to determine whether or not, in some fashion, it could be demonstrated to be unconstitutional or could be shown to be inapplicable here. But all the hurrying and scurrying of all the keen constitutional minds have not affected in one iota the particular statute, nor its terms; but it is said that it is inapplicable to the present situation.

Let me take a minute with this statute. I do not pretend to be a constitutional lawyer, and I do not pretend to be able to meet others here in debate upon the Constitution. I will meet them, perhaps, by and by, in other ways and in other fashions; but let me call your attention to the language of this statute and see if you ever heard plainer language:

> Whenever insurrection, domestic violence, unlawful combinations, or conspiracies in any State so obstructs or hinders the execution of the laws thereof, and of the United States, as to deprive any portion or class of the people of such State of any of the rights, privileges, or immunities, or protection named in the Constitution and secured by the law for the protection of such rights, privileges, or immunities, and the constituted authorities of such State are unable to protect, or, from any cause, fail in or refuse protection of the people in such rights, such facts shall be deemed a denial by such State of the equal protection of the laws to which they are entitled under the Constitution of the United States; and in all such cases, or whenever any such insurrection, violence, unlawful combination, or conspiracy opposes or obstructs the laws of the United States or the due execution thereof or impedes or obstructs the due course of justice under the same, it shall be lawful for the President, and it shall be his duty, to take such measures, by the employment of the militia or the land and naval forces of the United States, or of either, or by other means, as he may deem necessary, for the suppression of such insurrection, domestic violence, or combinations.

Is this form of strike confined to a single State, the State of Michigan? Not so; not so. It spreads its dreadful form away out to the Pacific coast, through all California. It goes into Colorado. It goes into every State in the Union where there are industries and where there are workmen. It is not in one State that this occurs; it is in many States that it occurs. Under that statute it is insisted that the President may intervene if he desires, in any way that he desires, and that he may then, in that fashion, end this whole matter.

A week ago today I said, "By the use of six words the President of the United States could end all these strikes: 'I will not tolerate sit-down strikes.'" Then I said nothing more until yesterday. I simply presented this statute as a means which was given him under the law, if he chose to pursue it, and which he might use if he spoke.

The cases upon the subject are very few; but there is a later case than those cited by the Senator from Idaho or the Senator from Indiana. It is true that the case to which I am about to refer is one in an inferior Federal court, and it refers to the particular statute in question. I said yesterday, in fairness, in presenting this statute, that in 1922 an Ohio court had passed upon the matter and held that the statute made action by the President a matter of absolute discretion. I read simply the last paragraph from a case found in Two Hundred and Eighty-second Federal Reporter, page 934:

> For these reasons it is concluded that the marshal cannot be ordered to police this district in Perry County, and its railroad facilities, nor can this court exercise any jurisdiction under section 5299 of the Revised Statutes, which makes it lawful for the President, in the exercise of his discretion, to employ the Army as aforesaid.

That was in 1922. The cases that have been cited are of an earlier date. But let us not lose sight of the question before us.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, would it disturb the Senator if I should interrupt him?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Oh, no; the Senator may interrupt all he wishes.

Mr. MINTON. The case the Senator has just cited was a case that arose in Ohio, I believe, where a Federal district judge had issued an injunction in a labor dispute.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Yes; I said so.

Mr. MINTON. And the attorneys for the employers simply asked the judge to call upon the President of the United States to come out there and enforce his injunction; and the judge very properly said, "Whether or not the President acts at all is a political question which only the President has the right to decide."

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Certainly. The court said it was absolutely a matter of discretion with the President.

Mr. MINTON. The opinion of the court did not say at all, or attempt to hold, that this act was at all applicable to the situation.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. It did not hold the act unconstitutional.

Mr. MINTON. It simply held that it was not applicable.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. It held that it was not applicable because the matter rested in the discretion of the President, that is all; and I called attention to that fact yesterday.

Now, consult together, gentlemen, and find, if you will, a way of response; but let us take up the question that is now before us, and upon that question decide what we are going to do.

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] comes here with an amendment which provides for a condemnation of the sit-down strike. We have in many instances before taken the position that the Senate should express itself on matters of public policy, and the rule which is invoked by the Senator from Idaho is more honored in the breach than in the observance. We have heretofore taken the position that when a matter of moment arose in the country, we could express ourselves upon its public policy, and we have acted accordingly. Now comes the Senator from South Carolina with his amendment. Why not pass upon it? If Senators believe as John L. Lewis believes in the matter of the sit-down strike, let them vote against it; that is their right. If they believe as William Green believes in the matter of the sit-down strike, let them vote for the amendment. If they believe as United States Senators that they should do their duty in this land, let them vote for it. That is all that is involved here now, nothing else.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I will concede that the Federal question does not yet appear to have been presented and is not presented today in the State of Michigan; and if that is so, the argument on the pending amendment to the effect that it is proposed that we shall interfere in Michigan is not really relevant.

The point is that the Federal question is presented in the bill which is pending, and there can be no doubt about that. The coal bill on our desks proposes to nationalize the coal industry; it proposes to fix prices in intrastate and interstate commerce; it proposes to levy a tax which all purchasers of coal in interstate commerce must pay.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me, I ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed to insert as a part of my remarks of a few moments ago more of the opinion in the civil rights cases.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I am very much obliged to the Senator. When we come to the antilynching bill, I shall read that opinion, and I will be glad to have it in the RECORD.

The pending bill is a Federal bill proposing to levy an internal revenue tax to be paid by all consumers of coal. It even proposes to impose a penalty tax of 19½ percent upon the sale of coal in interstate commerce, to be returned upon condition, and amongst the conditions are conditions relative to the employment of labor, and bargaining with labor as to wages, hours, and conditions of employment.

Agreeing that the innocent amendment of the Senator from South Carolina may not be relevant to the situation in Michigan, we cannot deny that it is absolutely, unqualifiedly relevant to the proposed legislation, and that is the question before us. I will read the amendment. It proposes to insert in the section of the bill relating to labor language as follows:

> It is further declared to be the public policy of the United States that no employee of any producer of coal whose employment has been terminated, or who for any reason has ceased to work for such producer, shall remain upon the property upon which he was employed after he has received written notice from such producer to leave such property: Provided, That this paragraph shall not apply to property occupied as a dwelling.

The amendment is therefore relevant, and the amendment does not relate, unless one wishes to relate it, to the situation in Michigan. We are framing in the proposed legislation a national policy with respect to the production of coal, and, other provisions having been framed, the Senator from South Carolina merely proposes, in the light of this very dreadful experience in the midst of which we are, to set out a further condition, to the effect that if we provide these benefits for the workers, we will also declare that they shall not sit down upon the property in which they work and take possession of it.

The question is that simple. It is so simple that I wonder that we have reached the point where that sort of thing has to be done, but I recognize that it must be done. I recognize that we have reached the point where there is debate in the United States as to how the national authorities stand on so simple a question as that.

I do not know that I have read a more important sentence in the press in the last 10 years than I read in the column by Mr. Walter Lippmann several days ago entitled "The President of the United States", and printed, I understand, in 160 daily papers. The sentence was as follows:

> For the first time in their history the American people are questioning whether the party in charge of their Government believes in law or is willing to sustain courts.

I do not say that that was just or unjust; I do not utter that sentence as my sentence, but I do say that the Senate of the United States may well take note of a statement so solemn, a statement so grave, coming from a very eminent publicist, who so far as I know has never been charged with being a partisan. I do not intend to pay any special tribute to Mr. Walter Lippmann. He was the editor of the Democratic New York World, and achieved great distinction in the days of Woodrow Wilson, as I recall. When the World was merged, he became a writer for the press, and we may say safely for him that from that day until now he has commanded a great audience in the United States, and he has always commanded great respect.

I will agree that he did not support the President in the last election, and if anyone wishes to impute that to Mr. Lippmann for partisanship or to discredit his solemn statement by the fact that he voted against our President, he is welcome to do so. I do not think that affects the seriousness of the fact that so notable a man writing for so many newspapers should have made that statement.

Is the statement true or not? Senators, is there not from one end of our country to the other at least something of a fear, something of a suspicion, not that a political party but that the general authorities are hesitating to enforce the law, to sustain the judgments of courts and meet force with force in the name of the law? I think there is. I think we should deal with that.

On that point we can look to see just how things have happened to bring that about. I would much prefer to discuss this matter on its merits as an amendment to the proposed legislation, independent of the situation in Michigan; but the situation in Michigan at least has been nationalized politically and socially. I am saying to the Senate that I could not conceive of anything more unfortunate than that we should fail to adopt the amendment at this time in view of these circumstances.

It might not have been so well to bring it up; but, once it has been brought up, if there be a reference of it to a committee, whereby we escape the responsibility of voting, a postponement whereby we create the impression that we hesitate, that we fear an adverse vote, at any rate, we expose ourselves to the interpretation that we are unwilling to say that one man should not take charge of the property of another. That is all. We are unwilling to say that there is a difference between "thine" and "mine." We are unwilling to say that the ancient foundations of the common law are unimpaired.

We stand at this moment upon a thousand years of accepted custom amongst the English-speaking people on this subject.

Mr. President, I am going to be very definite about this matter. Who involved the President of the United States in this situation? I did not. The Senate did not. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] did not. John Lewis did. We had just as well confront the fact. He stood upon the housetops of this land, and, in excess of arrogance, announced that he had elected Mr. Roosevelt President, that he had contributed half a million dollars to the campaign fund, and he demanded that the President of the United States of America come to his deliverance and take his side. That is the way it started. Capital did not start it. The owners did not start it. John Lewis started it, and America will finish it—do not worry about that. Whether or not the Senate is willing to meet the situation, I do not have any doubt it will be met adequately in the hearts of the American people. Their instincts are sound, and I am not afraid.

That is the way the matter started. I am going to be a little bit more definite. I shall not criticize the President about it, but his answer to John Lewis left a great deal to be said, and a great deal more to be imagined. He said, "This is no time for headlines." Perhaps it was not. It was the time for John Lewis' headlines. I say this with all my heart: I wish the President had said, "I am very grateful to Mr. Lewis for his help in the election. I deeply appreciate the contribution he made to my party. I am proud of the vote of the 2,000,000 or 3,000,000 or 4,000,000 or 5,000,000 people that he claims to have delivered." (I do not think that he delivered them.) "But I am the President of the United States and the servant of all the people. I do not intend that anyone shall ever say to the President that he has to do this, or that he has to do that, or that he has to do the other." I wish he had said that; and had he done so there would have been an end to such a situation in America. But he did not say it.

Then that was followed by a little statement from the Secretary of Labor, Mme. Secretary Perkins. At that time she had been proclaimed in the newspapers as the spokesman for the President. That was in connection with the invitation to Mr. Sloan to come down to Washington. I am not saying that she was the President's spokesman. I do not know. I do not think the President has a spokesman. At least he said Mr. Stanley High was not. [Laughter.] When he said that, I think he said no one was. I will make that record all right, too. This lady said that the legality of the sit-down strike had not been determined, and since then she has added that she said "determined in the courts"; but at the time the statement was uttered, as I read it in the newspaper, it stopped with the words "the legality of the sit-down strike has not been determined."

However, I will add those words to the sentence so that it will end "has not been determined in the courts." What has that to do with the matter? Stealing is stealing, and we do not have to determine that in court to know it. Murder is murder. We do not have to try a case to find out what murder is. Trespass is trespass, and the invasion and holding of the property of the owners by men who sit there and refuse to go out, and who arm themselves, is unlawful. That has been testified to by the English-speaking peoples, and practiced in their customs, and accepted for a thousand years; but the Secretary of Labor of the United States did not know it.

Mr. President, that was bound to make a very bad impression upon the American people. That was bound to give some substance to the accusation that Mr. Walter Lippmann brought against the authorities.

Then we had another. Mr. Landis, purporting to be a great lawyer——

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, before the Senator leaves the Secretary of Labor let me ask him one question. It is a fact that at the time she spoke the courts had not passed upon this question?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. And it is the fact that since the courts have spoken she has said that the orders of the courts and the law should be obeyed?

Mr. BAILEY. Very true, Mr. President. I am sorry I did not make that as clear as I wished to make it, and I am glad to have the opportunity to do so. What I am saying is that we do not have to wait for the judgment of a court to know that a sit-down strike is unlawful. Anyone who does not know that you are doing an unlawful thing when you walk into my house or property and take possession against my will, just does not know anything. I think that is manifestly true. If it is not, let us see what will happen in America. Let us see how far matters will go.

Men will walk into your hotel and say, "We will stay here until you put us out." The thing is contagious. They will come into a restaurant and say, "We will sit down until you feed us, and the legality of what we are doing has not been determined. We will wait until it is determined in the courts. We will make it necessary for you to go through the courts." You will have to go down and get a writ, and send for the sheriff, and, as the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MINTON] said, call for the posse comitatus. Is that not a strange sort of thing to bring about here in America at this late date? Is that not inconceivable?

There are some things, my fellow Senators, which are assumed to be true. We run the world on a certain amount of presumption. I think the presumption that every man knows all the law is a very violent presumption, but I think the presumption that everyone knows the ordinary law is not at all a violent presumption. When a man takes my knife, I know what that is. The legality of that is not a matter of doubt, and I do not want to have to go down to the magistrate's court to prove it, either; the thing is so elementary.

I was going on to say that Mr. James M. Landis, Chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, and even now about to become dean of the Law School of Harvard University, gets up and makes a speech in the midst of this situation, and says, "We are coming into new concepts of the law", but what they are we do not know. However, I imagine in the general run of these new concepts we intend to throw over the Constitution, destroy the Supreme Court, and then put dynamite under the common law, and have some new concepts written by an enterprising lot of gentlemen here who seem to have decided that they will do what the Almighty said He is going to do at the end of the world—"make all things new."

Mr. President, I am for this amendment. I should be for it if it had not been brought up. I should be for it if the Michigan strike did not exist. But since it has been brought up in the midst of this strike, and since this doubt has been thrown into the minds of the American people, since we do have this question in America, I welcome the opportunity to go on record. I hope that the Senate will not listen to any counsels of procrastination or any motion to divert it, but that the roll will be called and that I may be given the privilege of saying that I am against the sit-down strike. I am against it, not only on the ground that it is fundamentally immoral and is actually unlawful but I am against it on the further ground that the friends of labor could not do the cause of labor, possibly, a greater injury than they are doing by encouraging workers to resort to violence in the form of invading premises which they do not own, sitting there and talking, and, if I am to believe the press, in many cases arming themselves, and therefore inviting force and defying law.

So, Mr. President, as I see it, that is the issue. I do not look at the Michigan strike as the cause of this amendment. I would vote for it independent of the strike in Michigan; but since the amendment comes before us under the circumstances prevailing, I interpret that situation as adding irresistibly to the necessity for presenting it here and calling the roll and, if we can, passing it and letting the American people know that there is law in the United States and that the Senate believes there must be law in the United States.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan obtained the floor.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. GEORGE. I rose to speak briefly on the subject under discussion. I will not interfere with the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. President, I am probably the only Member of the Senate who was in Michigan when the General Motors strike was settled. I was in the capital city of my State on the day Mr. Chrysler and Mr. Lewis and Governor Murphy agreed that the sit-down strikers in the Chrysler plant should evacuate that plant. I am probably the only Member of the Senate who was present at the United Automobile Workers' mass meeting in the city of Detroit, and I am frankly astounded that general intimations have been made on the floor of the Senate that my State, or the great city of Detroit, is in a condition of insurrection. There has been the greatest exaggeration not only on the floor of the Senate but in the press about what is occurring in Michigan. Furthermore, I am a little surprised that a Senator from the State of South Carolina should seek to impose upon the people of the State of Michigan some advice as to how they should run their internal affairs. It seems to me that South Carolina raised quite a rumpus something like 75 years ago about Federal interference within the boundaries of that State.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President——

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Just a moment. Further, Mr. President, I wish to say, as a representative of my State and as a citizen of Michigan, that we do not need any advice from the United States Senate as to how to run our internal affairs. I now yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. BYRNES. I merely wanted to say to the Senator that at no time during my remarks did I ever refer to the State of Michigan. I thought possibly the Senator was laboring under some misapprehension as to some statement he thinks I may have made.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Not at all. It is certainly obvious that the Senator's amendment was elicited by the fact that there is trouble in the State of Michigan and elsewhere regarding sit-down strikes.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I yield to my leader.

Mr. ROBINSON. The whole burden of the remarks of the Senator's colleague [Mr. VANDENBERG], advocating the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina, was that the President ought to tell Michigan and the parties to the controversies there what they should do or what they ought not to do, rather than, as the law contemplates, that the authorities of Michigan should advise the President as to whether they need his assistance.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I thank the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. President, we in Michigan can take care of this situation. I think Governor Murphy has done an excellent job up to the present time. He settled the General Motors strike, and no man recalls reading in the newspapers that there was any bloodshed or any violence other than the seizure of property.

I believe in the next few hours an announcement will be made of the settlement of the Chrysler strike; and I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that only 3 or 4 days intervened after the issue of the injunction in the State court requiring the evacuation of the Chrysler plant that that plant was evacuated without the use of force.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. The Senator stated that the General Motors strike had been settled. I read something in the newspapers yesterday to the effect that there had been a recrudescence of the difficulty and that the strike was not settled.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Let me say that I talked to the Governor of Michigan this morning, and he told me that in three or four places a few men had sat down without any direction from the labor leaders, but they were merely small, sporadic affairs that have no influence on the larger factories.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. WHITE. The Senator suggested that this is entirely a local problem with which the Senate of Michigan is competent to deal. It has been reported to me that during the course of this sit-down strike letter carriers of the United States have been forbidden access to the plant in which the sit-down strikers were entrenched. I have been told, too, that revenue officers of the United States going, in pursuance of their duties as revenue officers, to a certain plant where there was a sit-down strike were denied admission into the plant. I have also been told that there have been prosecutions in the State of Michigan because of interference with mail carriers of the United States. Is there any truth in those statements?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I do not know that one single statement the Senator from Maine has made is founded on fact; I myself do not know of any such cases.

Mr. WHITE. The Senator has heard the report, has he not?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. No; I have not.

Let me state further to the Senator from Maine that I think the General Motors Corporation has an excellent legal staff, and I know the Chrysler Motor Corporation has an excellent legal staff, and neither of those great corporations has applied to a Federal court for any aid or assistance. I am confident that if there were any Federal question involved, they would have applied to a Federal court for an injunction.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Just for the sake of fixing the facts—and I know my able friend is just as interested in the facts as am I—five men have been arrested for tampering with the mails, and, according to the Detroit News, "they identified themselves as sit-down strikers at the De Soto plant." That may sound a little more ominous than it really is. Apparently what happened was that mail carriers were forbidden the right to deliver mail in the strike areas.

Mr. WHITE. May I ask the Senator if that is not interference with the processes of the Government of the United States?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Well, it would seem so to me.

On the other point upon which information was sought—and I rise only to submit such information as I have available—I know that a deputy collector of internal revenue was refused admission to one of the cigar plants in Detroit where the sit-downers were on strike, although he was subsequently voluntarily admitted.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I do not doubt for a moment the facts as stated by my colleague; I had not heard of the incidents referred to; but I submit that two or three isolated instances of that kind do not justify interference with the affairs of Michigan by the officials of the United States Government.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I will agree to that.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. My colleague says that he agrees to that statement.

Mr. President, we are taking care of the situation in Michigan. A bill has been introduced in the Senate of the State of Michigan by the majority leader, Senator Palmer, from the city where the General Motors sit-down strike started, namely, the city of Flint, specifically declaring the sit-down strike to be illegal. There is the voice of the majority party, the Democratic Party, in the State of Michigan. And I do not think the senate or the people of Michigan need any advice from this legislative body in that respect. Let them take care of this situation.

I referred to the fact that I attended a mass meeting held by the United Auto Workers. As I stood in front of the city hall of the city of Detroit the first sight that greeted my eyes in the parade was the American flag, which was carried highest, and which was first. Then came a band playing The Star-Spangled Banner, and then signs reading, "No government by injunction." Mr. President, there have been many Members of the Senate who have echoed that same sentiment—"no government by injunction." The workers gathered in Cadillac Square, before the city hall, and several speeches were made.

There was not an instance of disorder on the part of the union. There was an arrest by the police of two men who were admittedly and obviously Communists and had no connection with the United Automobile Workers.

I know my colleague [Mr. VANDENBERG] will bear me out when I say that the Detroit Free Press is the chief conservative organ of the State of Michigan and has almost uniformly since 1896 supported the Republican Party. I do not bring this in as indicating a partisan question, but I would say that at least Malcolm W. Bingay, the editor of the Detroit Free Press, is not a partisan of labor. Hear a few of the sentences which he used in describing that mass meeting in Detroit and describing the situation as it exists in Detroit today:

Detroit is a city on a hill. Ever since it became the cradle of the motor-car industry it has been the cynosure of the world.

Historians, sociologists, economists, engineers, magazine and newspaper writers, from all the nations of the earth, have been pouring in here to study Detroit, the dynamic, for the past 25 years.

Newspapers and magazines from all over the United States poured men into Detroit Tuesday to report the "revolution." Headlines blazed on the front pages of the metropolitan and country press alike across the land.

Stories and rumors floating over the Nation that there is a "revolution" starting in Detroit are as unfounded as any to the effect that Harry Lauder bought a round of drinks.

The demonstration on Cadillac Square was far more orderly than the celebration of the Detroit Tigers winning the world series—and only about one-tenth in size.

We are not worrying much about any revolution in this country when the lads who want to raise hell have difficulty finding parking space for their cars before they start their demonstration.

There was not one violent word or action in all the 2 hours of the crowd's gathering. More than half the 50,000—more or less—people who gathered in Cadillac (not Red) Square were sightseeing, out to enjoy whatever fun there might be.

If every city in the Republic was as safe and sound in its Americanism as is Detroit this would be a fine country.

Quit hiding under the beds and don't believe the wild yarns about us. Detroit led you out of the depression and we will continue to head the parade back to prosperity.

Mr. President, I wanted to relate these facts to the Senate. I have been in Michigan three times since the first of January and I assure the Senate that no such state of insurrection exists there as has been indicated by some of the speakers today.

My colleague has not criticized the conduct of the situation by the Governor of Michigan. I wish to compliment him here publicly for the attitude he has taken. I do not agree with my colleague that this problem is on the President's doorstep. We have at the head of the government in Michigan a Governor who can and who has taken care of the situation. We realize that it is more acute in Michigan than in any other place in the United States.

Let me say to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] and to the Senate that if they will let Michigan take care of Michigan's affairs, this matter will quiet down and subside sooner than if we attempt to interfere by advice without any power to enforce that advice by some action on the part of the Senate of the United States.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I do not know whether a record vote will be had on the particular amendment at this time, and for that reason I wish very briefly to express my own views about it.

It is of course regrettable that the distinguished junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. BROWN] should think that the amendment is aimed at his State. Certainly, it is not aimed at his State so far as many of us who feel that we must support it are concerned. It does happen that a peculiar practice incident to a general strike has occurred in the State of Michigan, according to the newspapers, but it has occurred elsewhere, and there is, of course, not the slightest disposition or purpose to reflect upon that great State or to intimate or suggest that it is not able to take care of its own problems.

Mr. President, it is also somewhat surprising that it should be seriously argued here that the Senate has no right to express itself unless it has jurisdiction over the subject matter so that it may make its expression effective if it becomes necessary to do so. That is not the case here at all. On occasion the Senate of the United States has condemned the murder of Christians by the Turks. We had no power to enforce any decree in Turkey and we had no idea of doing so. But that is not the case here.

What is the case here, Mr. President? We are asked to write a code for a great industry; that is to say, we are giving to a great industry the power to write a code of fair practice—that and only that. We are saying what shall go into that code of fair practice. According to the bill now before us—and, indeed, that is the only theory upon which the bill can be sustained—we are confining the whole thing to interstate commerce.

On page 11 of the bill to which the amendment has been offered it is said:

For the purpose of carrying out the declared policy of this act the code shall contain the following conditions and provisions, which are intended to regulate interstate commerce in bituminous coal and which shall be applicable only to matters and transactions in or directly affecting interstate commerce in bituminous coal.

There is not a scintilla of evidence upon which it can be insisted that Congress is asked to express even its opinion with respect to anything but interstate commerce.

What has the fourteenth amendment to do with the matter? The failure of a State to enforce its laws or to guarantee equal protection of the law has nothing to do with the matter. Those who brought this bill here asked the Congress to say what should go into a code of fair practice. That is all.

Then, in section 9 it is provided there shall be collective bargaining. The right of labor is fully protected. Then, it is said that the Government itself would have nothing to do with coal that was not produced under that expressly declared public policy. I do not quarrel with the policy. It is right. But is it not also proper to put into a code of fair practice the simple declaration that the Congress of the United States, as a matter of public policy, does not approve of the retention of the plant of any producer of coal or any processor of coal by those who have ceased to work and who have severed their connection with the producer or processor?

I know very well that those who go on strike do not actually sever their connection with their employers. I know the legal theory of the strike, and that is that the men are not separating themselves from the service; they are but temporarily ceasing to discharge their ordinary duties, at the same time insisting upon rights which they believe they have the right to insist upon. I can very well understand that in the evolution of the law we have now come to regard many things as legal in great labor disputes which, according to the strict rules of the common law, of course were illegal. But, after all, what our courts have held is that the right to strike is absolute, and the right to enforce the demands of those who engage in the strike is likewise absolute, so long as they engage in lawful acts. Picketing, of course, has been sustained as being a lawful act, but picketing outside of the premises of those who complain of the picketing.

I do not know what further step in the evolution of the law may come, and that is not so much the question here. If we are going to write a code of fair practice, for my part I should be guilty of indefensible and inexcusable quibbling, and, in my judgment, the American people would justly condemn me, if I should say "I am not willing to say that as a matter of fair practice no one ought to hold the premises in which he is at work in this industry, producing articles of interstate commerce, after he has separated himself from the service."

That is all there is to the amendment. It is nothing but a declaration of what we regard as a fair practice upon the part of those who strike. It is not aimed at any particular State. It cannot be. Michigan, so far as I know, has had no strike in coal mines. Indeed, it is difficult to conceive how a sit-down strike could be carried on in the coal industry in any large way. Men are not going to sit down underground in the mines. There may be some processes, some surface operations, in which they can sit down. It may be that in the long run of things it will be said that if the men who sit down resort to no force or violence, they have a right to remain in their places of employment for at least a reasonable length of time to see if they cannot adjust and compose their differences.

That is not the question, as I see it. The question is, if we are going to write a code of practice for a great industry under which we give those engaged in that industry very great advantages, and we are going to say to the industry some of the things that it must put in the code, why can we not go further and say that we do not think the sit-down strike is a practice that ought to be encouraged?

Mr. President, for my part I do not think it is a practice that ought to be encouraged. I disclaim any intention to challenge in any way the right of any State to control, to manage, to settle its own difficulties, its own problems; but with respect to interstate commerce in bituminous coal I do not think it would be a fair practice for those engaged as workmen in that industry to do what is forbidden by this amendment. I do not know that Mr. Lewis approves any such course of action. I will not assert that he does. I do not know. I shall be much surprised if he actually does approve any such course of action as we are here asked to forbid.

Mr. President, I desire to say a word more and then I am through. There has been in this country for many months past too much lawlessness. It has not been confined to lawlessness upon the part of labor, organized or unorganized; but there has been too much general disregard for law and for order. In high places, pronouncements have been made that were calculated to undermine the confidence of the people of this Nation in their Government.

You may say what you please about it, but every man who takes an oath to uphold the American Constitution takes an oath to defend the three branches of government created by the Constitution—at least I do—and it is just as much my duty to defend the legislative branch as it is to defend the executive branch in the exercise of its powers, and it is equally my duty to defend the judicial branch in the exercise of its powers under the Constitution. Of course, neither branch has any right to go outside of its powers. No one is called upon to defend either the executive or the legislative or the judicial department of government if any one of them transgresses the powers vested in it under the Constitution. By the primal law of increase, every lawless act tends to bring forth seed after its own kind.

You cannot shake the confidence of a people in the very integrity of any branch of this Government without shaking the confidence of that people all the way down through the structure of government. You cannot destroy the confidence of the American people in the highest court in our judicial system without weakening and destroying the confidence of the people in the humblest magistrate's court in the remotest rural district in the land.

So, when we write a code of fair practice, do not talk to me about having no jurisdiction over the subject matter. Perhaps we have not; but you ask me to write a code of fair practice. Do not bring in here any decisions of the courts saying what our power is and what it is not. If you ask me to write a code of fair practice, then I have a right to say that I do not think it is fair for anyone who has quit work in any coal-processing plant or producing mine to sit down there and hold possession after having severed connection with the plant. That is all we are asked to say.

Mr. President, I am perfectly certain that if we are going to write a code of fair practice for that part of a great industry which is engaged in interstate commerce, and if we are willing to sidestep and avoid an amendment of this kind, we shall add nothing to the respect of the American people for law and order.

Having said this much, I desire to make a further statement.

All my adult life I have believed, and I yet believe, that the courts of this country cannot adequately deal or even properly deal with the great clashes that sometimes occur between employer and employee. I have said before, and I repeat, that the Congress should devise some other method of handling a situation of the kind which has developed in some of our States, and which frequently may recur in any of our States, in fact, in all our States.

It is not fair to the judicial system under which we live; it puts upon it too great a strain, under which it may break sometime if we undertake to make the courts settle and adjust the great disputes which arise when masses of men are struggling to assert what they believe and feel to be their rights. But that is not so much involved here. Let me repeat, here we are writing a code, here we are saying that certain things should go into that code, certain things as to fair practices; that if certain things occur they should be recognized as unfair practices, and should be dealt with accordingly. We are merely asked to express our opinion as to whether or not an amendment such as that offered by the Senator from South Carolina should be included in a code of fair practice which is, under the legal theory of the bill, voluntary, not compulsory at all, because the compulsion is in the levy of a tax and in the omission of nearly all of that tax if the coal producers will become voluntary subscribers to the code.

Mr. President, I should not have said anything, but would merely have voted if I had felt sure that a vote would come upon the amendment.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, regardless of the merits or demerits of the sit-down strike, the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina would be as much out of place in the Guffey coal bill as a blacksnake would be at a ladies' lawn party. It has no reasonable relationship to the pending measure. It proposes a gratuitous legislative insult to 450,000 coal miners who are innocent of the conduct which the amendment is designed to condemn.

If the Senate desires to declare a policy or enact a law to discourage or prohibit the unionization of the cotton mills of the South, it should courageously and directly address itself to that task and act upon a measure the language of which could not be misinterpreted and the purpose of which could not be misunderstood.

The amendment, by plain implication, unjustly stigmatizes nearly a half million miners who have committed no crime and violated no law.

It might be desirable for the Senate to declare policies concerning many things.

For example, a declaration of policy against the hideous, common outrage of lynching; against the barbarous burning at the stake of human beings who have not been legally convicted or legally accused of any offense, ought to be proclaimed, but manifestly by appropriate means and not through the instrumentality of a rider attached to a bituminous-coal bill.

During a former session of the Congress I earnestly pleaded in this Chamber for the passage of an antilynching bill. Some of those who are today most vociferously urging a declaration of policy against unoffending mine workers led the forces which defeated the antilynching legislation. These distinguished Senators killed a measure which would have prevented the transmission of invitations by radio to the entire population of a State to witness the merciless mutilation and burning to death of an ignorant, helpless, unconvicted human being.

These able and honorable statesmen have brewed a veritable tempest in a teapot over the sit-down strike. In the matter of a strike, they strain at a gnat. In the matter of a lynching, they complacently swallow a camel. The mine workers would rather have no legislation at all than to have it encumbered with this obnoxious amendment.

Some may argue that we should write into the bill a declaration of policy against the sit-down strike because it contains a declaration that the toilers have the right to organize and bargain collectively. But it should be remembered that for more than 40 years the abuses at which this declaration of policy is aimed has prevailed in every great industrial center in the land. To my regret it has prevailed in the State which I endeavor to represent to the extent that a reactionary coal operator on a certain occasion more than 25 years ago declared that if union representatives attempted to organize his miners he would have the organizers shot down like dogs on the courthouse lawn.

Mr. President, 4 or 5 years ago in a mining village near Fairchance, Pa., I attempted to go into the home of a miner to confer with him about an automobile wreck which he had witnessed, and in which a woman had been instantly killed. Just as I entered the gate, 20 or 30 feet in front of the cottage in which the miner lived, some one rapidly approached me, grabbed me by the shoulder, and said: "Hold on buddy, you cannot go in there."

I turned to see who was so rudely addressing me, and, behold, there was a coal-company private thug, with two revolvers strapped to his side. When I protested against his impudent interference, he said: "This is company property. The man who lives in that house is one of our miners. You cannot go in there without my permission, and you cannot get that permission until you tell me your business. Furthermore, you cannot talk to that miner unless I am present and hear what you say."

Mr. President, these are but two of innumerable instances that could be cited in support of the contention that for many years coal miners throughout the country were, by some of the operators, treated not as free American citizens but as slaves. Long-continued denial of the right to organize and generally enjoy the liberty guaranteed to the miners by the law of the land is responsible for the declaration of policy which the bill now contains.

If those who wish to declare or legislate against the sit-down strike will submit their proposals in appropriate resolutions or bills, they will not have to wait, as the miners have waited for 40 years, for action by the Congress. The sit-down strike is only a few months old. No one even pretends that it is at the present in violation of Federal law. Therefore, why this impetuosity of action and this proposed impropriety of procedure?

Much as I desire antilynching legislation, I should oppose any effort that might be made to attach it to this bill, because the subject of lynching has no relation to the subject of mining coal. For a similar reason I oppose the adoption of an anti-sit-down-strike amendment to the pending measure.

Let me implore the friends of the coal bill, first, to support the motion made by the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to refer the amendment to the Committee on Interstate Commerce; and if that motion does not prevail, next to vote to kill the amendment outright and without delay. If Senators do not defeat the amendment they need not concern themselves about the passage of the bill, so far as the miners are concerned, because they do not want the legislation if it is encumbered with the slanderous amendment now under consideration.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, in the first place, I desire to say that I seek to cast no reflection upon anyone by reason of the position he takes, regardless of the side he may be on in this controversy. As I look at the question from the viewpoint of various Senators, I think I can see reasons for the positions they take, even though their positions are exactly opposite to each other. I question no man's motives with respect to the attitude he conscientiously feels he ought to take on this question.

To begin with, Mr. President, I concede that I myself may be prejudiced with regard to the subject. I have seen the controversy between organized labor and capital as it has been going on and progressing for a great many years. I have known something of the controversy that exists between labor and capital. When I began my study of the question I was rather opposed to organized labor, because I never had been associated in the business line with controversies of this kind until long after I had grown up and reached manhood. I did not know until many years afterward the questions which I have since conscientiously come to believe have confronted labor in its continuous struggle against organized wealth. But as I have seen that struggle continue, all my sympathy has been brought to the side of labor in the very unequal and often unfair contest which it has continually waged with organized wealth. What I have seen of the struggle between labor and capital may somewhat have affected me in the conclusion I have reached. I am not conscious of being prejudiced, but I realize that human beings are unconsciously prejudiced and that I am no exception to the general rule.

There was one organization in particular which I thought was obliged to wage what I considered an unfair contest and struggle. That was the organization of men engaged in the coal industry, an industry that we all know is and has been for years rather sick, and which needs help, which must have it, no matter from what standpoint we approach the problem. That was true before the World War, and it is much more true now.

In the first place, the men who mine coal in this country have had to engage in labor under conditions which were almost outrageous. The very nature of the work itself was almost disgusting. The pay which they received was among the lowest given to any laborer in any class. I have seen those men struggle with rich operators, operators in control of the mines, to whom the laborer had to come on bended knee, and had to accept the conditions, terrible as they were, or go without a job.

For instance, we all know the history of the "yellow dog" contract. Consideration of the "yellow dog" contract was had in Congress for many years. Congressional committees investigated that subject for several years. How unfair the "yellow dog" contract was. In this struggle the miners kept on laboring, trying to keep their families together, and through it all they lived in misery and poverty.

Mr. President, almost always when these struggles occurred, as we trace their legal history, we find that if any doubt existed as to the rights of organized wealth on one hand and the coal miner on the other, the doubt was resolved against the coal miner.

Probably that is natural in our civilization. Men of wealth to a much greater extent than the laborers control the judgment of the Federal judges, control the actions of Federal marshals, and the servants of the courts, and every one who has to do with enforcing the law.

Years and years passed on, and the miners struggled from the time they were children until they died of old age, working in the coal mines and laboring against terribly adverse conditions. It seemed that from time to time their organization, if they had one, when it came into a conflict with the combination of operators forming a monopoly, always got the worst of it. The laborer had to walk up to the counter and sign the "yellow dog" contract in order to get a job. If he refused and said, "That contract makes a slave of the worker", the operator simply said, "That is the best I can do. Go on and get a job somewhere else."

The coal miner went to the next operator, and the same "yellow dog" contract was put before him. Go where he would, he could not escape signing away his liberty in order to save his children and his wife from starvation.

After years and years of that kind of work and activity, what effect is it all going to have upon the minds of such workers? What effect would it have upon you or upon me? When listening to the evidence that has come from time to time before committees of the Senate picturing these terrible conditions, I have often wondered that the laboring men have not at times gone farther than they sometimes have when they have transgressed the letter of the law, if not its real spirit.

However, we remedied that situation as to the "yellow dog" contract after a long fight. Gradually, through years and years of traveling along this road, labor has been getting a little more of its fair share of recompense.

No one proposed for the operators that they should have a code providing how they should handle their laborers. However, as we became more highly civilized, we began to realize more keenly that the miner and his wife and his children were human beings, and should be treated as such.

The bill under consideration attempts to take another step in the coal-mining industry for the benefit of both operator and miner. Now, comes the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina. I concede that any Senator can give good reasons for supporting it. I shall not quarrel with anyone on that question. As I see it, thinking over the years that have passed, and the struggle between the miner and the operator of the mines, I think it is a mistake that this amendment should be here. I may be entirely wrong. I may be prejudiced about the matter, but to my mind it is a great mistake. Senators have said that since the amendment is offered, whether they vote for it or vote to send it to the committee, they may be very severely criticized. Of course, criticism comes to all of us. It is part of our lives. We must meet it, and we ought to be ready to meet it. We have to be ready to meet it, whether we like it or not. But why attach this amendment to a bill affecting the coal miners in the bituminous-coal industry. It is a slap at the sit-down strike, disguise it as you may; and technically the argument of Senators is correct that probably it has no reference to Michigan and Detroit and the automobile workers; but if it had not been for the automobile sit-down strike in Detroit, it would not be here for a moment. I do not think any Senator would contend to the contrary. That is the reason it is here, although the struggle of the workers in Michigan is being handled, so far as I am able to see from my distance away from it, in a most admirable way by the Governor of Michigan.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POPE in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. DAVIS. I desire to inform the Senate and the Senator that there has been a sit-down strike in Pennsylvania in a bituminous coal mine. It occurred near Uniontown, in Fayette County. But in that instance the State officers and the national officers of the miners' union directed the miners to come out of the mine and then later directed them to go back to work.

I agree with the Senator that there is no place for this amendment on the pending bill.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator.

So, Mr. President, it is not the coal industry that brings this amendment here; another situation that brings it, namely, a sit-down strike in another industry. While the Senator from Pennsylvania is undoubtedly correct in his statement that the sit-down strike to which he called our attention occurred in the coal industry, as a matter of fact, such a strike is almost unknown in that industry. The organized miners have not engaged in that kind of a strike, and, so far as I know, there is no indication that they are going to do so. Now, the men engaged in this industry—an industry which has suffered more than almost any other in the country in the effort to maintain the rights of labor—are met here at the threshold of this bill by an amendment saying to them, "You must not engage in a sit-down strike."

I am not surprised that the Senator from West Virginia says many of the coal miners take it as an insult. They have no intention of engaging in such a strike.

I admit that Senators have a right to offer such amendments. I can see the viewpoint of those who think that such action ought to be taken without reference to the coal business or any other business; but why commence with the very industry that has gone through more agony and more suffering, perhaps, than has any other industry in the country in the effort to maintain the rights of labor against capital?

I do not see any reason why we should declare a policy on the sit-down strike. It is a comparatively new development. I may be wrong; perhaps we ought to make such a declaration; and I am not afraid to meet it. I do not think the sit-down strike is right; I do not think anybody will defend it; but when I see men who have gone through what the miners have gone through for the last century, I wonder, if I were a miner, if I would not resort to almost anything, legal or illegal, if I thought my rights were being further trampled under foot. That is no defense of the sit-down strike; I offer none; and, so far as I know, there is none; but I do not see any reason why we should encumber this bill, dealing with a particular industry, by an amendment which would affect workers who have never engaged in a sit-down strike.

If Senators feel that we ought to declare a national policy on a question as to which we have no legal jurisdiction, out of respect to those who think we ought to take such action, I am willing, although I do not believe it is necessary that we should do it; but if we do it, we ought to do it without reference to any condition that exists in Detroit or Pennsylvania or any other State. Our action ought to be in the form of a separate declaration; and if we are fair, when we make it we will put something in the declaration besides the sit-down strike. We will not stop there. We will go on and make a declaration of policy both as to labor and capital. I will not back away from it; I am willing that should be done; but I do not see any reason why we should put this amendment on this particular bill and only half do the work. If it ought to be done, it ought to be done right.

Therefore, Mr. President, it seems to me, inasmuch as I believe this amendment is out of place here, that I am justified in voting to send it to the committee. I would be willing to kill it without sending it to the committee, and I do not care much whether the motion is carried or not; I would vote against the adoption of the amendment; but, out of respect to other Senators who do not agree with me as to the declaration of policy, I would be willing to send it to a committee and let them work out a resolution which will declare an entire policy, if that is desired, such as we think ought to be declared, even though we are doing it, mostly at least, on a subject matter over which we have no right even to legislate under the Constitution.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, in the hope of concluding the consideration of the bill today, I am going to submit a request for unanimous consent. Before submitting the request, however, I must state, in duty to my colleagues, that if the amendment, and amendments to the amendment, be not referred to the committee, from the information that has reached my ears, the debate is likely to be continued indefinitely. I am not complaining about the prolongation of the debate but am merely stating a fact as one of the considerations which have prompted the motion, and which also prompts the request.

There are amendments to the amendment, as I am advised, which seem likely to reach out into other spheres of legislation so broad and so hotly contested as to make imperative a session tomorrow, with little likelihood of the bill reaching a conclusion even tomorrow.

I do not make that statement in order to induce any Senator to take action that his judgment and conscience do not prompt him to take.

Much of the discussion today has related not to the express provisions of the amendment but to the factors and the influences which underlie it. I have no doubt that those large employers who have continuously refused to submit themselves and their interests to the jurisdiction of the Labor Relations Board, and others who have employed renowned detectives, who have gone among the workers in large plants and industries and wormed their way to the head of labor organizations in order to deceive and betray the laborer—I have no doubt that all those would like to have at this juncture a one-sided and emphatic declaration by this branch of the Congress which would immediately be construed by all parties to labor controversies as a movement solely in the interest and on behalf of those who flout the law at their own will, but who invoke our conception of high standards of conformity to law in order to continue their own bad practices.

Now, let me make it clear, if I did not do so yesterday, that I have no approval here or anywhere for violations of law. I think it is the duty of all citizens to conform to the laws, both State and National; that it is just as much the duty of a man or a combination of men employing a hundred thousand workers to render obedience to the mandates of State and Federal laws as it is the duty of the humblest worker who earns by his hands a livelihood for himself and his dependents to respect and abide by the law.

It has been made clear during this debate that such are the limitations on Federal power and authority—limitations embraced in the Constitution, the laws and decisions of the courts interpreting the laws and the Constitution—that the President or other executive agencies have no power, upon their own initiative, to employ force or to intervene in a labor controversy where interstate commerce has not been interrupted, where the mails have not been interfered with, or where Federal property has not been seized or threatened with destruction.

There has run through the debate implied criticism of both the President and the chief executive of the State of Michigan. It is well enough for Senators to say that the amendment, in their interpretation of it, has no relationship to the situation in Michigan. But when they say it they speak from the standpoint of legal technicalities and not from the standpoint of actuality. We all know that in certain cities in the State of Michigan particularly, including Detroit, there have been conditions which every one of us has feared would result in violence. The Governor of the State of Michigan has a responsibility in the matter, as was clearly pointed out by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] in his address earlier today. I do not believe, from the information which has reached me, that the Governor has been in default either in purpose or in act in attempting to preserve law and order. I go further than that. I think when the smoke of this great domestic battle has cleared away, when the thunder of the conflict has died into silence, the Governor of Michigan will stand preeminent among governors and among citizens as one who has been moved by a sincere desire to do his duty to his State, to the people of his State, and to secure the observance of law and order.

It is easy enough here in the peace and security of the Senate Chamber in the city of Washington, where so many factors combine to make life pleasant and agreeable sometimes—and where at other times they seem also to combine to make life disagreeable and miserable—to say that the Governor of Michigan, the minute these laborers sat down in disregard of the law of Michigan and of the decisions of the courts of Michigan, should have moved the militia and the State police to remove the laborers from the plant in which they had assumed to discontinue labor and to sit down, and in the event the militia found themselves in sympathy with the laborers, as frequently happens under such circumstances, or in the event that the militia were inadequate to accomplish the task, the Governor ought immediately to have called on the President, and that the President ought then to have ordered, as he probably would have done, the use of Federal troops to carry out the orders of the court to compel the laborers to vacate the plant and the buildings.

It is easy enough to take that position, but when one does take it he ought to understand just what it means. In case of riot, disorder, or violence, in the case of destruction of life and property, of course, there must be immediate action; but where the offense that is being committed is a trespass, it is wise—at least, it does not seem wrong—to take into consideration the probable results of the employment of immediate and great force to compel a discontinuance of the trespass.

We all recall, as was stated by the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. BROWN] in his very impressive remarks today, that in the Michigan city, where this trouble principally is centered, enormous groups of people assembled, and that they were surprisingly peaceful and law abiding; that the only occasion for the exercise of police authority came because of the conduct of certain individuals who were known to be agitators and who were desirous of bringing about a state of violence and violent disturbance.

Assume that the Governor had immediately ordered the militia to clear the plant, and that 120,000 men, women, and children had gathered about the plant and that a riot had occurred, what would have resulted? Hundreds of lives would have been lost and thousands of persons probably would have been injured. One may say, if he pleases, that that makes no difference, "law is law and might is might; kill them if they offer any resistance", but I do not condemn the Governor of Michigan for pursuing a course which brought order out of chaos and brought peace back to a community which was greatly distressed.

It is right and proper, in giving consideration to policies underlying these problems, to seek to prevent violence, to avoid the killing or injuring of human beings if it is reasonably possible to do so. There will be time enough, if the issue is forced, to exercise the power that may be necessary to preserve law and order when law and order are being invaded.

We do not use the Army of the United States in every case where a labor dispute arises, even though repeated acts of trespass may be committed. What is it that in logic is being asked here by eminent Senators who have spoken on the subject? It is that in any case of a sit-down strike, wherever and whenever it may occur in any State, the President of the United States shall move an army to end the sit-down strike even though there is no riot, even though the Governor of the State has not requested Federal intervention.

We cannot say that the President should use the Army to end a strike and not say that he should use it in all cases where the same conditions exist; and, as has been pointed out, unless there is a case where the State authority is in antagonism to the Federal authority, unless there exists a case where the State violates its obligation under the Constitution of the United States to give equality of rights to all citizens, or where the President has been asked by the head of the State government or by the legislature, if it be in session, to use his power and authority, we cannot say that it is violative of sound practice for him to fail to express his opinion as to how the controversy should be adjusted.

Every man in this country and every officer in this country has the right to express his opinion freely; and, if he has a duty to perform, the obligation is upon him to move with reasonable promptness in the discharge of his duty; but I do not think the Senate, without full knowledge of the circumstances, would wish to commit itself to the doctrine that every time a controversy arises in a State cognizable solely by State authority, the President is under a moral obligation to tell the State authorities what to do, unless his assistance be invoked by the State authorities.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DUFFY in the chair). Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PITTMAN. I dislike to interrupt the Senator from Arkansas at this point; but if I should be occupying the chair a few minutes later, and the pending point of order should come before the Chair for a ruling, I feel that I should be compelled to sustain the point of order; or if, on appeal, the matter should go to the Senate, and someone else should be in the chair, I should be compelled to vote with regard to the question that the point of order was well taken. Of course, I do not know how the Senate eventually will act on the matter; but I suggest that if the Senate should vote that the point of order was well taken, the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] would be before the body, because in that case the motion of the Senator from Arkansas to refer the amendment to the committee would fail.

Personally, I do not like to vote on the amendment at all, because I think it is quite indefinite. It may mean what I have in mind with regard to the so-called sit-down strike, or it may not. Whether or not the author of the amendment means that on such notice the former employees must get out of the county in which the coal mines are situated, I do not know. If he means solely that the former employees must get out of the tunnels or the collieries that are actually used in operating the mines, that is one thing; but the amendment does not say that. I should very much prefer to have language used that means what I am thinking about than to have language used which may be differently interpreted; but the chances are that we shall have to vote on the amendment in its present form as indefinite and uncertain as it is.

Therefore I make this suggestion: I should like to see this matter temporarily laid aside, and submit to the Senate a resolution of this character:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the so-called sit-down strike is illegal and contrary to sound public policy. The Senate only assumes to speak as to strikes in industries within the jurisdiction of the Federal Government.

I think that puts a plain issue before the Senate as to whether they favor the so-called sit-down strikes in industries that we have a right to talk about; that is to say, industries within the jurisdiction of the Federal Government.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield to me?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I have a great deal of sympathy with the resolution which has just been suggested by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN]. Anticipating that possibly we might come to a vote upon the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], I prepared this morning the following resolution, which, with the permission of my friend from Arkansas, I shall be glad to read.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well; I yield for that purpose.

Mr. KING. The resolution is as follows:

Whereas so-called sit-down strikes are taking place in various parts of the United States; and

Whereas such strikes are resulting in disorders, interference with property rights and with interstate commerce, and result in a growing spirit of disrespect for law and the courts; and

Whereas a continuance of such strikes is inimical to the maintenance of a democratic form of government, and is subversive of the authority of the United States: Therefore be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that sit-down strikes are illegal, and are hereby condemned.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield in order that I may express my opinion with regard to what has just been suggested by the Senator from Utah?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, personally I very much prefer as simple as possible a form of action with regard to this matter. Again, I do not wish to admit all of the "whereas" clauses of anyone, nor do I wish to admit all of the definitions of anyone with regard to a sit-down strike. I know what the so-called sit-down strikes are to which I object; and I think the objection which has been made by some persons that we have no right to deal with strikes in industries over which we have no jurisdiction may be well taken. Therefore, I very much prefer the simple form that it is the sense of the Senate—we are not attempting to speak for the House of Representatives, but we do attempt to speak for them if we incorporate such a declaration as a part of this bill—it is the sense of the Senate that the so-called sit-down strikes are illegal, which I think is universally admitted, and contrary to sound public policy, which I think is universally admitted; but I think we should add to that declaration that we only assume to speak with regard to strikes in those industries within the jurisdiction of the Federal Government.

I make that suggestion.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, addressing myself now to the proposal of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and the proposal of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], if I correctly understand their suggestion, it is in some way to suspend consideration of this subject on the pending bill, and that a resolution—either a simple resolution or a concurrent resolution—be introduced, in the language which has been mentioned by the two Senators, for disposition hereafter.

I do not understand that the Senator from Nevada asks unanimous consent to lay aside the amendment, whatever that may mean in parliamentary usage; but if he should do so, I assume that it would mean the withdrawal of the amendment to the present bill, with the understanding that a resolution on the subject should be presented subsequently.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair desires to state that he had in mind that possibly the leader of the majority would ask unanimous consent to lay aside temporarily the unfinished business and act on such a general resolution and then resume the consideration of the unfinished business.

Mr. ROBINSON. No, Mr. President; I do not feel warranted in doing that.

Mr. BORAH and Mr. BYRNES addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield first to the Senator from Idaho, who first addressed me.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I understood the President pro tempore to say that he would hold the motion of the Senator from Arkansas to be out of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That would be the ruling of the present occupant of the chair.

Mr. BORAH. That being true, I see no reason in the world why we should not vote directly on the amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON. I now yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I simply wish to say that, so far as the suggestion of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] is concerned, if the Senator from Arkansas can see his way clear to adopt that course of action, I shall be willing to withdraw my amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I do not consider that request satisfactory to the friends of the proposed legislation. I think a discussion of the sit-down strike question, as the proceedings today and yesterday disclose, is one that cannot be very quickly terminated. I do not believe it could be done today or tomorrow. It seems to me that the subject ought to have more consideration; that it should have consideration first by a committee, and that if that be not done it would necessarily prolong the consideration of the pending bill. For that reason I do not yield to the suggestion of the Senator from Nevada.

It is perfectly competent, as every Senator knows, to submit resolutions in the Senate and have them referred to committees, or have them lie over under the rule and take them up as the order of business in the Senate permits; and the fact is that what has occurred here during the last few minutes shows that there will be very wide diversity of opinion as to the form any resolution may take.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH and Mr. CLARK rose.

Mr. ROBINSON. Here is the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] submitting one resolution, and the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] submitting another resolution; and I have not the slightest doubt that the Senator from Washington [Mr. SCHWELLENBACH] would have a resolution which would be well worthy of consideration, and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], and even possibly the Senator from Arkansas himself. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK. It was not my purpose in rising to suggest a different form of resolution. Would the Senator from Arkansas be willing, assuming that the other Members of the Senate are willing, to have both the resolution suggested by the Senator from Utah and the resolution suggested by the Senator from Nevada referred to an appropriate committee, by unanimous consent, with instructions to report back on a day certain, say, 30 days from now?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; that is the unanimous-consent request that I was about to make, and I will now make it.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the pending amendment, with all amendments thereto which may be offered and all substitutes therefor which may be proposed, be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, with instruction to the committee to report back to the Senate a resolution within 30 days.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BAILEY. I object.

Mr. ROBINSON. I knew there would be objection. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield in order that I may present an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I ask that the amendment which I send to the desk be stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is pending at the present time a point of order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President and gentlemen of the Senate, if such we be [laughter], in view of the declaration of the Chair that he has already, without hearing, decided the case against us, I do not know that I care to make an argument on the parliamentary issue. The fact of the matter is that I think the Chair might very well have given someone a chance to explain to him the great arguments underlying this dispute; but with that judicial deliberation which is so characteristic of him, he was good enough to warn me that, in the exercise of his judgment, he had already reached a conclusion.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, is the Senator nominating the Presiding Officer for an additional Justice? [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON. Before the conclusion of my remarks perhaps even the Senator from North Carolina will understand them. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, there is only one precedent. The alleged precedent cited by the Senator from South Carolina, for which the Senator from Kentucky is responsible, is not a precedent at all. In that case a Senator offered an amendment, and another Senator made the point of order that the amendment should be referred to a committee—he did not make a motion—and the Chair, of course, held that amendments could not be referred on points of order.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The matter arose on an adverse report from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads on a resolution which had previously been presented by the late Senator from Louisiana, Mr. Long. During the consideration of the adverse report the Senator from Louisiana sought to amend his own resolution, and the Senator from Tennessee then made the point of order that automatically the amendment ought to go to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and as the Presiding Officer I held, of course, that it would not go to the committee automatically. The precedent did not involve any motion to send the amendment to the committee, and, therefore, that question was not passed on.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; but the point I am making is that no one here is suggesting that an amendment to a bill or joint resolution can be committed to a committee on a point of order. It seems plain.

Oh, wise and upright judge [laughter], in view of the single precedent which exists, which I feel the Senate has just as much power to override or overrule as it had to establish in the beginning—in view of the existence of that precedent, I do not wish to prolong the debate by insisting that the ruling of the "wise and upright judge" should be appealed from. I do wish to state, however, that on the day before the precedent relied on by the Senator from South Carolina was established, an almost directly contrary precedent was fixed by the Senate, and that the precedent relied on is not rested on the decision of the Presiding Officer and an appeal therefrom, but it is rested on a statement by the Presiding Officer that he did not think the motion was in order, but would submit it to the Senate; and when the Senate voted on the question that day, it voted that the motion was not in order. So I do not care to embarrass with an appeal the fair and upright judge who has determined the case against me before hearing. The truth is that I am inclined to respect the decision the judge has made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has made no decision as yet.

Mr. ROBINSON. No; but the Chair has announced what his decision will be, and I do not feel justified in concentrating an issue on the parliamentary question. I am willing to withdraw the motion, and to take a vote on the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina, after such amendments thereto as may be offered shall have been considered by the Senate.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Arkansas withdraws the motion, and therefore I have nothing to say about the point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order falls, of course, when the motion of the Senator from Arkansas is withdrawn.

The question now is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES].

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I desire to say a few words with reference to some of the statements which have been made as to the amendment offered by me yesterday.

The question is asked by a number of Senators—and I assume in good faith—as to why the amendment is offered to the pending bill. It was offered to this bill because the bill was pending before the Senate; because this measure seeks to set up a code for the coal industry; because in section 9 the bill declares a public policy for the United States with reference to the relations existing between employers and employees in the coal industry.

The first paragraph of section 9 sets forth that it is the public policy of the United States that employees in the coal mines of the Nation shall have the right to bargain collectively. No penalty is provided for a violation of the paragraph. It is solely a declaration by the Congress of a policy to govern the labor relations between employers and employees in this industry.

I am in favor of that declaration of policy. In my years of service in the House of Representatives and in my service in the Senate I do not recall any occasion when I failed to vote to permit the wage earners of the Nation to bargain collectively. I voted for the Wagner bill, and I voted for every other labor measure which is now upon the statute books. I voted for the Guffey bill in the last Congress. I intend to vote for the Guffey bill in this Congress, and this declaration of policy I have suggested is in accord with the views I hold and have always held on the subject.

The second paragraph of section 9 declares that no producer shall interfere with or coerce employees in the exercise of the right to bargain collectively. It is a declaration of policy, and I am in favor of that declaration of policy.

The third paragraph declares that no employee shall be required to join a company union. That is only a declaration of policy, and I am in favor of that declaration of policy. I am opposed to the company union and opposed to the requirement that any employee shall be forced to join a company union.

Therefore, Mr. President, I do not think anyone can say that I am unfriendly to the cause of labor when I say that I am in favor of the declaration of policy contained in these three paragraphs, when by the amendment I have offered I seek to add an additional declaration of policy, which declaration of policy would place the Senate on record as disapproving the sit-down strike, when every Senator who has yet risen in the Senate to discuss this subject has declared he is opposed to the sit-down strike.

Everyone who has assumed to speak for the United Mine Workers has said that they are opposed to the sit-down strike, and that even a declaration of policy of this kind would be regarded as an insult to them; that it would be regarded as slander even to intimate that they would be guilty of engaging in a sit-down strike. Then, if that is so, we are all agreed. Yet, as the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] stated yesterday, while we are all agreed that we are opposed to the sit-down strike, after making the declaration, too often we hear it said, "We are for the amendment—but, but—but it should not be on this bill", or "We are against sit-down strikes—but it ought not to be on that bill. It is not comprehensive enough", or "it is too comprehensive." No committee of the Senate could ever draft language and bring it into the Senate, but that many Senators would rise to say, "I am opposed to the sit-down strike, but I am opposed to the language in this amendment."

Mr. President, some Member may say, "Why not directly declare it to be the policy of the United States to disapprove the sit-down strike?" The very minute I should write that into an amendment the same Member will probably rise to say, "What constitutes a sit-down strike? Has that phrase ever been defined by a court? What do you mean by a sit-down strike?"

When that question is asked, I ask Senators what answer they could make? They could make no answer other than that I have written in this amendment, that an employee who is employed upon property, and ceases to work for any reason satisfactory to him, whether because he wants higher wages, or because he wants his organization to be recognized, or because he wants better working conditions—whatever the reason—when he ceases to work and then remains upon the property after receiving notice to leave such property, that man becomes within the accepted definition of a sit-down striker.

When you answer and say that a sit-down strike occurs where employees cease to work and insist upon remaining upon the property of the employer, your friendly opponent will say, "Well, if you mean that, why do you not say what you mean, instead of calling it a sit-down strike?" Because I recognized the force of that argument I put into the amendment just what it meant and just what you mean whenever you say "sit-down strike."

But it will be said, "Even if that be so, it should be put on some other bill." How could you put it on another bill when no other bill is pending?

Then some will say, "It ought to be introduced as a separate resolution." Introduce it as a separate resolution and what becomes of it? It is sent, possibly, to the Committee on the Judiciary, there to wait for the disposal of the Supreme Court bill, or is sent to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and when it goes out of that door of the Senate Chamber you could kiss your amendment good-bye. [Laughter.] It may be sent to some committee, but there is no purpose in sending it there except to let it stay there.

Members of the committee may say, "I am opposed to the sit-down strike."

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. Why does the Senator say that when it came to the Interstate Commerce Committee, of which I am chairman, it would never come out? Why does the Senator say that?

Mr. BYRNES. Well, I have known of so many things to go there which did not come out that I know what would happen.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the Senator think that everything which went there ought to have come out?

Mr. BYRNES. No; but I think that the Senator from Kentucky believes that nothing that goes there should ever come out.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator is very much mistaken. If he were a member of the committee, he would find out differently.

Mr. BYRNES. Perhaps so; but I am a Member of the Senate, and I have found out differently than the Senator suggested. Of course, I know that the Senator is not responsible for all actions taken by the committee, nor do I believe he would assume to be. But I am not new in this particular game, and I know that when an amendment of this kind is sent to a committee it is not expected to come out of the committee. Some other amendment might come out and some other bills might come out, but this amendment I fear would not come out. I fear that after it is sent to the committee, even with the best intentions in the world on the part of the majority leader, who has fearlessly declared his position time and again on this question, it would not come out. Earlier today, when it was proposed by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to send it to the committee, the committee to report in 30 days, it was the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] who rose to say, "But 30 days is a short time, inasmuch as the members of the committee are members of the Committee on the Judiciary and will not be able to give their time to it"; and the Senator from South Carolina knew that before the expiration of the 30 days there would come an appeal for more time, because the Court bill had demanded the attention of so many members of the Interstate Commerce Committee in another committee room.

O Mr. President, why 30 days for this question? The Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], I think, said, "Is it something new, is it something strange to say as a declaration of policy that if employees for any reason cease to work and are given notice to leave the property that they shall leave?" You can ask the average layman how much time he would need to consider that question and he would certainly think that 30 minutes would be nearer the time needed than 30 days. But if any Senator did not want to vote upon it, he would find 30 days a short time.

If in this amendment I had provided that no employee after he had ceased to work should remain upon the premises, some Member of the Senate would have risen and asked whether there was objection to employees remaining upon the property when there was no protest made by the employer. So I deliberately inserted the language that only when there was written notice should the employee be required to leave. Members of the Senate may take the amendment, they may analyze it, they may try to state it in simpler language, but they will find it practically impossible to do so.

Senators may say that our action will be misunderstood. No, Mr. President, what they really fear is that their action will be understood. There is no question as to how the people of this Nation will understand it. No penalty is provided. But it is a declaration of policy of the United States that if I am working on the property of the Senator from Nevada I am assured of the right to bargain collectively; I am assured that there shall be no discrimination against me because of my membership in a union; I am assured that I cannot be required to join a company union. But if for reasons satisfactory to me, I cease to work, and I sit down and refuse to leave the property, and defy you to put me out, and defy the officers of the law, that is against the policy of the United States. We cannot dodge the implication of this question. If you vote for this amendment, you are against the sit-down strike. No one will misunderstand that. If you vote against the amendment, no one will misunderstand it.

Let us assume that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], returning to his home shortly, should find that his good wife had today been advised by the cook in his kitchen that she wanted her union recognized, and, not being accorded that recognition, had determined to sit down in that kitchen, and not only would she not cook any dinner for him but refused to let anybody else cook the dinner for him, and, armed with the weapons of the kitchen, she defied the officers and said, "If you attempt to remove me there will be bloodshed." I hate even to speak of such a direful situation for the Senator from Mississippi, but I think the Senator from Mississippi would say that he did not need 30 days to enable him to declare that he was opposed to the sit-down strike. [Laughter.]

Oh, but Senators will say, "There is a difference." Yes; there is a difference. The difference is that in the case assumed by me just now the Senator from Mississippi would be subjected to the sit-down strike, and in all the other cases somebody else is subjected to the sit-down strike.

My good friend the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] talks about Michigan. I know that all Senators think of their States more than all other States, and having only recently come from the State he naturally would. But, Mr. President, this thing is not confined to Michigan. The two Senators from Michigan may be of that opinion because of the importance of the situation to them. The Governor of North Carolina announced only a few days ago that so far as that State was concerned law and order would be preserved. Perhaps the Senator from Michigan was not aware of it, but the situation had reached the stage in North Carolina where the students in the colleges had gone on a sit-down strike. Perhaps they are entitled to all their demands, but, nevertheless——

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. BAILEY. As I understand it, the strike referred to occurred in a girls' school, and the principal of the school said the girl students wanted to have more dates with the boys than they were getting.

Mr. BYRNES. That was a very laudable purpose.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the Senator call that a sit-down strike?

Mr. BYRNES. I would say it was a very laudable purpose, but the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from North Carolina can discuss it and possibly may agree upon it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRNES. I do.

Mr. KING. The able Governor of Connecticut stated a few days ago, in the light of this epidemic of sit-down strikes, that there would be no sit-down strike in his State and there has been none.

Mr. BYRNES. And the Governor of New Jersey made a statement of the same kind, and the Governors of two or three other States have also done so. The Senator from Michigan should know that when Michigan is unfortunately having trouble with sit-down strikes, it is not only the people of Michigan who are affected, but throughout the entire Nation men are out of employment and unable to earn a livelihood because of the sit-down strikes.

Mr. President, I have no desire to talk about any State; I certainly will not discuss what was said by my good friend from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], but I really doubt that he is correct in his viewpoint that the United Mine Workers of America would rather not have the Guffey bill than have an amendment on the bill merely declaring a policy with reference to the sit-down strike.

Mr. President, I voted for the Guffey coal bill which was passed by the Senate at the last session, and I intend to vote for the pending bill, even though I know it will raise the price of coal to the people of my State, because my hope is that the increased price will go to the miners who deserve it. But the miners, so far as I know, have never declared in favor of the sit-down strike. It is not necessary to their existence. I did not know that one had ever occurred in any of the mines until the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] said that there had been such a strike on one occasion in Pennsylvania.

The amendment, however, is not confined to any State or to any industry, and when the Members of the Senate say, therefore, there should be a general resolution on the subject, I recall to them that when the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] asked that this bill be temporarily laid aside, in order that there might be a vote upon the resolution which he read to the Senate, I immediately announced my willingness to agree, and to withdraw my amendment. I am willing to do that now.

I have no pride of opinion; but I believe that if we are going to declare a policy of the Government it is essential that it be declared, so that the people of America may know that law and order are to be preserved in this Nation. I will withdraw my amendment if consent can be secured for the consideration of the resolution suggested by the Senator from Nevada, or any other resolution which may be proposed by any other Member of the Senate, and it can be acted upon after the passage of this bill, or at any time next week, on any day which may be set.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. Would the Senator be willing, since there is a difference of opinion as to the proposition, to refer the various amendments and resolutions, including the pending one, to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, with instructions to report back a measure within a week, and then make it a special order in the Senate the following day, and no matter whether favorably reported or not, so that it may then be taken up and considered?

Mr. BYRNES. If the Senator from Mississippi will submit a unanimous-consent request of that kind, and it shall be agreed to, I will withdraw my amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator would be willing to do that, would he?

Mr. BYRNES. I announce it positively.

Mr. HARRISON. Then, Mr. President, I make the unanimous-consent request that the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina, and all related amendments and resolutions covering this particular question, be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, with instructions to report back to the Senate within a week, and that on the following day, when the report shall be submitted, whether it be favorable or unfavorable, it shall be the order of the Senate that it be taken up for consideration.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I object.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from North Carolina to withdraw his objection?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing to listen to my friend from South Carolina, but I am going to say very plainly to the Senate that I want a vote on this question, and I do not think we should delay a vote on it. I believe the American people are entitled to know before the sun sets today whether the United States Senate favors the sit-down strike or condemns the sit-down strike. For my part, I am willing to stand in my place and cast my vote and let the people know. If we do not let them know, if we hesitate, and if we are too prudent—I will put it that way—or are actuated by some sort of prudence, we are going to do more to make trouble than could be done in any other possible way. Now, let the word go forth that the Senate of the United States favors the sit-down strike and let it go on, or let the word go forth that the Senate of the United States is against the sit-down strike and condemns it, and we will have a clearance of the air in America.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield to me?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, there is no one for whom I have a greater regard and higher respect than I have for the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. BAILEY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. HARRISON. But would it not be better for it to go to the country by almost unanimous action here in the form of a resolution that it was the sense of the Senate that it does not approve the sit-down strike and have a vote on the question within a week—a few days' delay will not hurt particularly—than to have a resolution adopted by a divided Senate? I am just as much opposed to the sit-down strike as is the Senator, but there is a difference of opinion as to writing the declaration into the pending coal bill, making it applicable purely to one industry. I wish that could be settled, and I think the proposal I have made would settle the question very amicably, and we could adopt such a resolution within a few days.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina said he would listen to me.

Mr. BAILEY. I am prepared to listen to the Senator.

Mr. BYRNES. Then, if the Senator will listen to me, I will say to him that the only thing that could induce me to agree to the proposition of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] is the assurance that within a week we would have an opportunity to vote.

Mr. BAILEY. I do not want a week. So far as I am concerned, I shall insist upon my objection. I think this question is entirely too serious to permit hesitation, and I think it means too much to the American people. I am perfectly willing to take a beating on the amendment, but I am not willing to run away from the situation even for a week.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. So-called sit-down strikes have been in progress for 2 or 3 months; the most serious one has been at least temporarily adjusted by the "sit-downers" ceasing to sit down, and they have departed from the property. Inasmuch as no Senator during the last 3 months has seen fit to introduce any resolution condemning the sit-down strike, why is it so objectionable that we put the matter off for another week?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I will respond to that suggestion with the permission of the Senator from South Carolina. The fact that we have waited so long, and others in high authority have waited so long, is the best reason on earth why we should act now without delay.

Mr. BARKLEY. Has the Senator introduced any resolution on the subject and had it referred to a committee?

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from North Carolina has not, and I must say it did not occur to me there would be any question raised about the passage of one, either.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I think I have the floor.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. I should like to say that I would have to object to the request if the Interstate Commerce Committee is only going to be given 1 week for the consideration of the matter, because I know, if the resolution went to the committee, there would immediately be a demand on the part of many people to be heard upon it, and we could not very well deny them the right to be heard. It would take more than a week's time. I would not have any objection to the resolution going to the committee if a month's time or 3 weeks' time is afforded, but it would be impossible for the committee to act in a week.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I should like to vote on the sit-down strike question, but I would prefer to vote on it as not a part of the pending bill. It is obvious, unless we can reach some agreement, that we will have to vote on it as a part of this bill. I cannot see why, if we are going to vote on it anyway, anyone would be hurt by taking the proposition out of the bill and voting on it immediately, without further debate, after the bill shall be voted upon. That would give every Senator a clear-cut chance, without any other matter being considered in connection with it, to vote on the sit-down strike proposition apart from the mining bill entirely. I think it would be the only fair vote we could get on the proposition and we ought to have a fair vote on it.

I request the Senator from South Carolina to ask unanimous consent to have his proposal voted on immediately after the bill is voted on, so there will not be any confusion of ideas.

Mr. BAILEY. Does the Senator make a proposition to vote today?

Mr. TYDINGS. If the Senator from South Carolina will yield further, I should like to ask unanimous consent that the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina in the form of a resolution be voted on within 15 minutes after the final vote on the pending bill.

Mr. BYRNES. I would suggest to the Senator from Maryland that if that is to be done, the proper request would be to have the resolution made the unfinished business of the Senate upon the passage of the pending bill.

Mr. TYDINGS. I ask to have the resolution made the unfinished business upon the disposition of the so-called Guffey coal bill, so those of us who want to vote upon it can vote on it without reference to the Guffey coal bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator from Maryland and the Senator from South Carolina both understand that if this matter is taken up independently of the pending bill, it ought not to be taken up in the form in which it now appears, because it now applies only to one industry.

Mr. BYRNES. Of course, that is clear. The Senator from Maryland made that clear. He suggested taking it up in the form of a resolution, which would, of course, be open to such amendment as any Senator might care to submit.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. My inquiry is directed to the suggestion made by the Senator from Maryland. It seems to me there ought not perhaps to be a declaration by the Senate of the United States against the sit-down strikes generally, because, for instance, there is a sit-down strike in a matter that is purely intrastate. I do not know that I would favor voting for that. But this is a matter where the Federal Government has placed its hand upon the coal industry and attempted to nationalize it, so that under the power of the interstate-commerce clause it is seeking to control this great industry. Therefore it is quite proper that the proposed amendment should be considered apart from the pending bill.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I had yielded to the Senator from Maryland for the purpose, as he stated, of submitting a unanimous-consent request. That request is entirely satisfactory to me.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, in that view of the matter and in the hope that we may yet have an opportunity this week end for a breathing spell, I will submit a unanimous-consent request if the Senator from South Carolina will yield for that purpose.

Mr. BYRNES. I certainly yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], out of order, may introduce his resolution, that it may lie over on the table, and that the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina may be withdrawn. Of course, that requires his action.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I object.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from North Carolina is apparently going to object to anything that is proposed.

Mr. BYRNES. I ask the Senator from North Carolina if he will not permit the Senator from Arkansas to complete his statement?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is very kind. Of course, I could have done that, anyway. It is like the Chair ruling on a point of order when he has already announced that he has made up his mind to sustain the point of order. If the Senator from North Carolina has already made up his mind to object to any proposal that is made, probably it will not do any good to submit the request. However, my request is that the Senator from South Carolina be permitted to withdraw his amendment, that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] be authorized, out of order, to introduce a joint resolution in the form in which he read it to the Senate a few moments ago, and that at the conclusion of the consideration of the bill now before the Senate, the unfinished business, the Senate shall proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution of the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. BAILEY. I object to that.

Mr. BYRNES. May I say to the Senator from North Carolina that the only effect of that request is to afford the Senate an opportunity to vote upon the proposal separate and apart from the Guffey coal bill and immediately after the conclusion of the consideration of that bill.

Mr. BAILEY. Yes; and substituting for the amendment the joint resolution to be introduced by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I still have the floor and I want to ask the Senator from North Carolina if he would have any objection to the request made by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS]?

Mr. BAILEY. I am going to object to that also.

Mr. BYRNES. My suggestion is that my amendment in the form of a resolution be made the unfinished business, so we may vote upon it directly, and then the amendment of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] can be offered as a substitute, or any other amendment can be prepared and offered by the Senator from North Carolina or by any other Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I have no objection to that.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield?

Mr. BYRNES. Certainly.

Mr. WAGNER. If the proposed amendment is to be considered as a separate independent resolution, why does the Senator then limit it to one particular industry?

Mr. BYRNES. I believe the Senator has been here during the discussion and knows that the bill is limited to a particular code for the coal industry.

Mr. WAGNER. Does the Senator mean to express a preference——

Mr. BYRNES. Oh, no. If the amendment is to be introduced in the form of a resolution, it could be changed and give to the Senate an opportunity to express itself on the question of sit-down strikes in any industry.

Mr. WAGNER. I thought the Senator had expressed the view that if that is to be done, we ought not to confine it to one particular industry.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BLACK. The request should contemplate that amendments could be offered with reference to other labor practices without ignoring the Wagner labor relations bill.

Mr. BYRNES. Of course any amendment could be offered under the rules of the Senate. The Senator from Alabama knows that the bill to prohibit the importation of persons into a State for the purpose of interfering with workers who were engaged in peaceful picketing was introduced by me and passed in the last Congress.

Mr. BLACK. I fully understand that.

Mr. BYRNES. That law should be strengthened, and I intend to study the hearings before the La Follette committee in order to determine how it should be amended. The resolution I would offer would be open to amendment by any Member of the Senate, and therefore I think the unanimous-consent request should be granted, and I hope my friend the Senator from North Carolina will not object, so that we can have a vote.

Mr. BAILEY. I shall not agree to that.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I would not agree to that proposal with all those strings.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield?

Mr. BYRNES. Certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. Under the rules of the Senate, except on appropriation bills, any amendment is in order that may be offered by any Senator.

Mr. BAILEY. I have not any question about that. The amendment is before us. The point of order has been made against the motion to refer it to a committee. I see no reason why we should not proceed to vote. The Senator from Arkansas said I would not agree to any proposal that might be made, but I will agree to vote right now.

Mr. KING. I suggest that we take a vote right now.

Mr. BAILEY. I will agree to suspend the rules and vote right now or I will agree to vote at 5 o'clock. I am perfectly willing to vote, but I am unwilling to agree to delay in a matter of this kind.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President——

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I believe I have the floor.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Will the Senator yield to me in order that I may explain my amendment?

Mr. BYRNES. I shall be delighted to yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, I ask that the clerk may state the amendment which I have proposed as an amendment to that of the Senator from South Carolina.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Washington to the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 2 it is proposed to strike out "of any producer of coal."

In lines 4 and 6 it is proposed to strike out "producer" and insert "employer."

Following the word "property", in line 7, it is proposed to insert certain words, so that, if amended, the amendment would read as follows:

It is further declared to be the public policy of the United States that no employee whose employment has been terminated, or who for any reason has ceased to work for such employer, shall remain upon the property upon which he was employed after he has received written notice from such employer to leave such property, if such employer shall have fully and completely submitted the controversy with the employee or employees to the jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board, and, after investigation, the National Labor Relations Board shall have approved of the issuance by the employer to the employee or employees of the above-described written notice: Provided, That this paragraph shall not apply to property occupied as a dwelling.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, I desire briefly to explain the amendment. It is divided into two parts.

The first part is the elimination of the words "producer of coal", and the elimination of the word "producer" and the substitution of the word "employer", so as to make the amendment apply to all industries, and not limit it to the coal industry.

The second part of the amendment provides that as a condition precedent, before the Congress of the United States shall lend even its moral support to an employer engaged in a controversy with his employees, it is necessary for the employer to be willing to recognize the law of the United States.

That is all the amendment provides.

There has been much said here about violation of law. Many Members of this body today have expressed themselves as feeling that we have been going through some terrible experience during the last few weeks because there have been violations of law upon the part of employees in this country. I desire to say to them that I hold in exactly the same light as they do the violation of law by employees; but I am not willing to agree that the Congress of the United States shall make a declaration of policy condemning one side in this controversy for its violation of law and failing to say a word in reference to the other side for its violation of law.

Two years ago Congress enacted the Wagner labor bill; and Senators know that from one end of the country to the other the employers have simply refused to recognize it. They have been advised by their lawyers to refuse to recognize it. Senators remember that last year general word was sent out by that great institution headed by men in a neighboring State, the Liberty League, that they would provide legal advice to employers who desired to help them in the violation of the Wagner Labor Act. When the time comes that the Congress of the United States is solemnly going to denounce law violation, I say it ought to join in a denunciation of violation of the law that was solemnly enacted 2 years ago.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I yield.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator think we ought to go so far as to make this amendment applicable to purely intrastate matters? I am inclined to vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], because it relates exclusively to interstate matters. As I indicated a moment ago, under this bill the Federal Government nationalizes the coal industry. It spreads its broad mantle over that industry, including hours and wages, and so on. Therefore, there might be justification for a declaration by the Federal Government with respect to those matters that are purely interstate; but I should have some doubt as to the right of the Federal Government to declare with respect to purely intrastate matters.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Let me answer the Senator from Utah by saying—and I do not think we are very far apart on the question—that we are facing here a declaration of policy——

Mr. KING. As to interstate matters.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. We may pass a declaration of policy about interstate matters. We may also pass declarations of policy about the weather, or sin, or anything else; but so far as we can effectively do anything, it must be as to matters over which the Federal Government has some control.

When I say that employers must submit themselves to the Labor Relations Board before they may have even the benefit of our declaration of policy, that must necessarily, so far as the Federal Government is concerned, be limited to those things over which the Federal Government has some jurisdiction. We cannot say here that this case is interstate commerce, and another one is intrastate commerce; but in our declaration we should declare that employers must recognize the rights of the Federal Government where the Federal Government has jurisdiction, and submit themselves to the jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I desire to ask the Senator a question for information. Am I correct in the assumption that the employer cannot himself invoke the Wagner Act? Is that correct?

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, that statement has been made, but it is not correct. On the complaint of anyone, the Labor Board may act; or it may make inquiry upon its own initiative. That was attempted in the case of the General Motors industry in the St. Louis district; but before the Labor Board even had an opportunity to determine whether or not the particular industry was engaged in interstate commerce the circuit court interposed an injunction preventing it even from holding a hearing.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I desire to ask the Senator for a further interpretation; for certainly he is the highest authority available here on this subject, so far as I know.

Mr. WAGNER. No; I deny that statement.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Am I correctly informed that the Labor Board by its own ruling has decided that it will not, upon its own motion, invoke the terms of the act?

Mr. WAGNER. I am not informed as to that; but, even if that were true, it would not prevent an employer or an employee from going to the Board and registering a protest against an alleged violation of the law, and upon that complaint an investigation might be held. Because, when the Senator speaks of a rule, that is self-imposed. Under the law the Board has authority to act.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Let me go back to the law again, because I desire to be sure that I correctly understand the Senator. Do I correctly understand that an employer has the same right that an employee has to invoke the act?

Mr. WAGNER. I think so—simply by appearing before the Board and explaining the difficulty; and upon that action the Board makes inquiry as to the violation of law.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Whence arises all of this misinformation then?

Mr. WAGNER. I do not know, Mr. President. There has been a great deal of misstatement, even in some of the opinions of lower courts; but, having myself been a judge, I am very reluctant to criticize these opinions.

Some of them, however, I think have no basis.

Of course, we are going to know all about the whole matter very soon. I assume that the United States Supreme Court within the next few weeks will decide one or more of the live important cases which will enlighten us as to the limits of the jurisdiction of the Labor Board.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I understand the Senator's own opinion to be that an employer has the same right as an employee to apply to the Board under the law.

Mr. WAGNER. To present his grievances.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, I do not see why there should be great surprise upon the part of anyone in this country at laboring people having disregard for the law, when their employers, during all of this period of time, have so completely disregarded the law. The working people of this country 2 years ago thought they were getting a law which would be of some benefit to them and which would give them certain rights. They referred to the Wagner Labor Relations Act as labor's Magna Carta.

The Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], in his remarks day before yesterday, reviewed in detail, and much more eloquently and much more efficiently than I could, the disregard of the law by the employers of this country.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. Of course, if an employer secures an injunction from a court, I advocate that the injunction be obeyed, just as all law should be obeyed. But in a great majority of the cases the employer and his counsel have decided for themselves that the Labor Relations Act does not apply, and they have absolutely refused to give their employees the right of collective bargaining. Seventy percent of the strikes today are based upon a refusal of the employer to attempt to bargain collectively with his employees. That was so in the case of the General Motors, and it is so in the case of the Chrysler Co.

The only question involved in the Chrysler strike—and I regret as much as does anybody that there was a sit-down strike involved—is the request of the employees, when 90 percent of them belonged to the union, for the employers to sit down and bargain collectively with the union as the agency of all of the employees. The Supreme Court decided Monday, in the Virginian Railway case, that a majority representative has the right to bargain on behalf of all the employees. In my opinion, there would be no difficulty, there would be practically no strikes, if the employers of the country would recognize the law which we enacted, giving the workers the right to organize and to bargain collectively.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, if I may interrupt the Senator from New York, in view of the decision last Monday in the case just referred to, it seems to me that, so far as interstate commerce is concerned, the Supreme Court will have to uphold the Wagner Labor Relations Act.

Mr. WAGNER. The majority rule, of course.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes; the majority rule.

Mr. WAGNER. The Court has so spoken.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not see how they can avoid holding, at least so far as business engaged in interstate commerce is concerned, that the Wagner Labor Relations Act is constitutional. If they do go that far, it seems to me those who have been denouncing the Supreme Court will have to reverse some of their views on that subject.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President——

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I cannot yield for a discussion of the Supreme Court question.

Mr. WAGNER. I thank the Senator for yielding to me. I was about to say that the sit-down strike would not have occurred if the workers had been accorded the right we supposed had been granted them in the Wagner Labor Relations Act to bargain collectively. I regret that the sit-down strike was resorted to, but obedience to the law by the employers would have avoided it.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, the Senator from Washington has shown by his proposed amendment that he desires to amend the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina. I should like, in line with what the Senator is offering, to propose another unanimous-consent agreement to the effect that the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina be withdrawn and offered as a general resolution applicable to all industry, and that immediately upon the passage of the so-called Guffey coal bill the Senate proceed to vote upon the resolution of the Senator from South Carolina without further debate, and that each Senator shall have the right to offer any amendment thereto he may desire, but that the amendments shall be read and considered without debate, and that we will vote the question to a conclusion. In other words, under the proposal any Senator would have the right to offer an amendment, which would be read, and we could adopt it or reject it. I think the Senate has pretty well made up its mind and my proposal would not shut off amendments. We could have the Guffey coal bill voted on as a separate matter, and have the proposal of the Senator from South Carolina voted on, as well, with whatever amendments the Senate might wish to add to it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, if that is put in the form of a unanimous-consent request, I shall be compelled to object. I do not think the Senate ought to put itself in the attitude of voting on every conceivable kind of an amendment without any discussion whatever.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should object so far as the proposition included intrastate matters.

Mr. NEELY. Regular order!

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington has the floor.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, the question has been raised by the Senator from South Carolina that the latter part of the amendment which I propose would have the effect of destroying the purpose of his amendment. I do not agree with the Senator. This is only a declaration of policy, but, as such, I think the effect of the last part is no greater than the effect of the first part. Nevertheless, in order to meet the objection of the Senator from South Carolina, I will withdraw that part of the amendment after the word "Board" and before the proviso.

Mr. McKELLAR. How would the amendment then read?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the amendment as now offered.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

It is further declared to be the public policy of the United States that no employee whose employment has been terminated, or who for any reason has ceased to work for such employer, shall remain upon the property upon which he was employed after he has received written notice from such employer to leave such property, if such employer shall have fully and completely submitted the controversy with the employee or employees to the jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board: Provided, That this paragraph shall not apply to property occupied as a dwelling.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it does not seem to me that we can dispose of this matter today if we are to attempt to rewrite it. It will take some time to consider and study these suggestions. I do not see why we cannot be permitted to have a vote now upon the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from South Carolina. A great deal has been said about Senators not wanting to go on record. Let us have a vote on the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina. It was offered; it has been debated; it is the only amendment we understand, and while I have no doubt the amendment of the Senator from Washington is an improvement upon the original amendment—I should think it would be—yet it is a new proposal, and we certainly could not vote on it this afternoon.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, I am in full accord with the statement of the Senator from Idaho that it is difficult, almost impossible, to arrive at the proper wording of an amendment presented in this way and under these circumstances, and I am perfectly willing to agree to any unanimous-consent agreement which may be offered whereby we may secure an orderly consideration of the question; but, so long as there are those in this body who will not agree to any unanimous-consent agreement, and who insist upon taking the matter up now, then I believe we have a right to use what feeble means we have to try to improve the amendment presented as it is.

The amendment which I present merely adds to the original amendment a declaration of policy upon the part of the Congress that if we are going to lend any moral assistance to the employers in their controversies with their employees they must themselves comply with the law by fully submitting themselves to the jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board, created under an act of the Congress.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I wish to say a few words with reference to the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina. The amendment reads:

It is further declared to be the public policy of the United States that no employee of any producer of coal whose employment has been terminated, or who for any reason has ceased to work for such producer, shall remain upon the property upon which he was employed after he has received written notice from such producer to leave such property.

I shall vote against this proposal, but I do not wish to have it understood that when I vote against it I am in favor of the sit-down strike. I have been the friend of labor unions for a great many years; but I am firmly convinced that the sit-down strike will itself, in the long run, do more to injure the labor organizations of this country than anything else that can happen to them, because, in my judgment, public opinion will not for one moment stand for sit-down strikes generally throughout the country. However, it ought not to be necessary, and the Senate of the United States ought not to be called upon, to declare what is already the public policy of the United States. Why should the United States Senate vote to say that it is the public policy of the United States to be against stealing, for instance, or that it is the public policy to enforce any particular law upon the statute books? That is the effect of this amendment. Today, if an employee remains upon the property of any individual after written notice, there can be no question that under those circumstances he is a trespasser; and this amendment neither adds anything nor takes anything away from the law.

I wish to say quite frankly that, in my judgment, the President of the United States has been the best friend the labor organizations ever had in the White House. I regret exceedingly that under the circumstances the President has not seen fit to say to the labor organizations: "I have been your friend; I intend to be your friend; I intend to help you in every way I can to see that you have justice and that you have the right to organize and to have collective bargaining; but, for the benefit of the labor organizations themselves and the labor of the country, I think you ought not to resort to this method."

Labor organizations themselves will find that, if this method is persisted in, sooner or later a very small element of a labor organization, the very worst element of a labor organization, will be able to dominate and to control the labor organization itself. I do not care whether it is the American Federation of Labor or whether it is Mr. Lewis' organization, a little handful of men can join that labor organization, and they can then practically take control of it away from the leaders of the organization itself. I do not think it will be very long before it will be demonstrated to the legitimate labor leaders of the country that both from the standpoint of public policy and from the standpoint of the labor organization itself, the sit-down strike is not a practical method to handle labor controversies.

I regret very much, as I think every Member of the Senate regrets, that there have been sit-down strikes. I do not think any Member of this body favors the sit-down strike. I think, however, it would be unfortunate to have this amendment in the bill; and I do not think it is necessary that the United States Senate should go on record and declare a public policy as to that which is already the law of the land.

Is it necessary that the Senate of the United States say that it is the public policy of the United States that this particular law, or that particular law, or some other particular law be upheld in this country? I do not think so. For that reason I shall vote against this particular amendment.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. I am prompted to make an inquiry of the Senator from Montana, because in 1928, he and I as members of a committee, went all through the coal-mining region, and saw the exceedingly distressing conditions under which the miners were compelled to work at that time. I am fearful that as the language is now written it goes beyond merely a condemnation of the so-called sit-down strike, because, if the Senator remembers, in many places in the coal regions the operators owned the whole village. They supplied all the homes in which the miners lived. They supplied the theater to which the miners went. They employed the preacher who was to preach to the miners.

Mr. WHEELER. They owned the church.

Mr. WAGNER. They owned the church, and the miner had to go to the company store for all his purchases. We found in most cases, as I think the Senator will remember, that at the end of the week the miner owed the company store some money.

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. WAGNER. As the amendment reads, it seems to me that if it includes all of the company's property it also includes the homes in which the miners live.

Mr. KING. That has been amended.

Mr. WAGNER. May I have the benefit of the last amendment? If it has been amended in that respect I have wasted a great deal of time.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, it was so amended because the question that the Senator now raises was raised. It was amended so as to provide—

Property on which he was employed.

And then the proviso specifically says that it should not apply to property occupied as a dwelling.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I did not catch the last statement.

Mr. BYRNES. I said that it was modified as shown in the proviso with respect to dwelling.

Mr. WHEELER. It does not include the home, but even after the Senator has pointed out the change in the amendment, I do not think it is broad enough to cover the situation, because as a matter of fact in some places the company not only owns the dwellings but owns the stores and owns the towns.

Mr. WAGNER. How is the worker going to get anything to eat?

Mr. BYRNES. The language is limited to the property in which he was employed. He is not employed in the store.

Mr. WHEELER. I wish the Senator would read the language.

Mr. BYRNES. Reading on line 4:

Who for any reason had ceased to work for such producer, shall remain upon the property upon which he was employed.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me call the Senator's attention to this fact: Some of these mines are right under the town. It seems to me that the amendment goes further than the Senator intended it should go. I know of a certain town in the State of Massachusetts where the company owned the whole town. It owned the boarding houses, it owned the stores, it owned the factories, it owned the land, and it owned everything else. That is true in some of the mining towns, as the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] and I discovered when we were engaged in an investigation of the coal-mining industry.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, supplementing the remark just made by the Senator from Montana, I should like to say to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] that under the amendment as it now appears it would be quite possible for the occupants of a dwelling to be compelled to remain within that dwelling. They would have no right of ingress or egress. The Senator probably is overlooking the fact, which I think the Senator from New York and the Senator from Montana are endeavoring to point out, that frequently the dwellings are owned by the companies, and are on company property, and therefore that there is no means of entering or leaving except by the consent of the mining company.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, once more I am going to try a unanimous-consent request, because the debate which has just taken place shows that it is the general opinion that this provision ought to be omitted from the Guffey coal bill. Therefore, I shall try once more, after consultation with Members on both sides, to reconcile the differences. I ask unanimous consent that the pending amendment of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] be withdrawn and offered as a resolution; that immediately after the passage of the Guffey coal bill the resolution shall be made the unfinished business of the Senate, and that all debate thereafter, on the resolution and upon any amendment that may be offered thereto, shall be limited to 10 minutes to each Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BAILEY. I object.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. WHEELER. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. If this is a question merely of verbiage, there is no reason why, if we are agreed upon the infamy of the sit-down strike, we should not arrange it so that the language would satisfy all of us.

I was interested to hear the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] talk about 1928. I do not know whether he remembers it or not, but when the coal miners were here seeking someone to present their woes, they came to a man 3,000 miles away, who stood on the floor of the Senate and presented their case, and out of that presentation came an investigating committee, and doubtless out of that investigation comes this bill. When some of the gentlemen here today talk about us who want to prevent the sit-down strike as being opposed in some degree to the coal men, it is outrageous that they should indulge in that sort of assertion.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator heard me say anything like that.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. No; I did not say the Senator from New York.

Mr. WAGNER. I distinctly remember the Senator's activity to secure the investigation, and I think it was through the influence of the Senator from California that I was appointed a member of the investigating committee.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Exactly. When the matter was before the Senate the coal men could not find a single, solitary man to present their case, and so they came, as I said, 3,000 miles to find him. One of the gentlemen who is managing the bill now before us had at that time very little sympathy with my position.

That does not alter the fact that when there is a wrong, even though it does not concern the coal miners at all, it is but right we express ourselves. When we have reached the point where a question of policy should be initiated by the Senate, then we ought to write it into this bill, and we ought to write it instanter. Let us go on. Let Senators beat this proposal if they want to do so. Let them beat it if they desire. Let those who do not care one way or the other about the sit-down strikes vote against the amendment if they wish. That is all right. Down the river we are going, a little bit further down the river we will go in these days that are peculiar and dangerous, and eventually we will go down to a dictatorship of one sort or another. This sort of thing is exactly what some believe, doubtless, but it is the sort of thing some of us will fight with all the vigor we possess.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I recall very distinctly being a new member of the Committee on Interstate Commerce at that time. Because I was a new member of the committee and because very few Members of the Senate could be induced to introduce a resolution calling for an investigation into the frightful conditions which existed in the coal regions of Pennsylvania, West Virginia, and other portions of the country, Mr. John Lewis and others interested in the coal miners went to the senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], and, at their request, he introduced a resolution which came before the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate. A subcommittee was appointed. I was a member of that subcommittee. The Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] was likewise a member of the subcommittee.

We went out to examine the conditions which were said to exist. We discovered not only that coal companies owned the mines, but they owned the town, owned the churches, paid the preacher, owned the stores, and, in some instances, owned all the land in the town itself. When some of us went on the land we were driven off the premises of the coal companies by private police, notwithstanding the fact that we were members of the Interstate Commerce Committee of the United States Senate. As a matter of fact, injunctions were issued to prevent the committee from holding meetings. As I recall, an injunction was issued to prevent the people from going to church and attending church services. The late Senator Gooding and other members of the subcommittee went to church notwithstanding the injunction.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. I should like to know if the Senator reached the conclusion, by reason of the issuance of injunctions of that kind, that the coal companies also owned the courts?

Mr. WHEELER. I do not think there is any doubt about it. As a matter of fact, in one instance we had before the committee the judge who had issued the injunctions, and in no uncertain terms we condemned him because temporary injunctions in many instances were granted, and later permanent injunctions were granted without any hearings at all.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President——

Mr. WHEELER. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WAGNER. I remind the Senator that one injunction even restrained the United Mine Workers from feeding the unfortunate workers who were on strike.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes. There is no question about that. It was most un-American. It was inconceivable that there could be in the United States conditions such as we found to exist in Pennsylvania. We were able to expose those conditions under the resolution which was introduced by the Senator from California.

Notwithstanding such deplorable conditions, I assert that the sit-down strike cannot be justified, because two wrongs do not make a right. I am amazed when I hear Senators say that because deplorable conditions have existed in the mines and because some of the mine owners have violated the laws of the country, that is an excuse for somebody else to violate laws upon the statute books of the State or the Nation.

Mr. WAGNER. Both sides should obey the law.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes; both sides should obey the law. So far as I am concerned, mining companies should obey the law and likewise the men themselves should obey the law. When it comes to pass in this country that the laws may be violated at will, then we cease to have a government.

I would have no hesitation in voting for a general bill, but I call attention again in closing to the fact that the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina goes farther than it should go, and I believe farther than the author of the amendment intended it to go.

Mr. PITTMAN submitted an amendment in the nature of a substitute intended to be proposed by him to the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] to the bill (H. R. 4985) to regulate interstate commerce in bituminous coal, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed, as follows:

That it is the sense of the Senate that the so-called sit-down strike is illegal and contrary to sound public policy. The Senate only assumes to speak as to strikes in industries within the jurisdiction of the Federal Government.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. SCHWELLENBACH] to the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES].

Mr. ADAMS obtained the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Colorado yield to me to make a brief statement?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is now 5 o'clock, and it does not appear likely that the bill can be disposed of this afternoon unless the Senate chooses to remain in session for a considerable time. I have consulted with the Senators who are particularly interested; and, if the Senator from Colorado will yield for that purpose, I propose to move an executive session, and, after that, to move a recess until next Monday.

Mr. ADAMS. I yield for that purpose.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. SHEPPARD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported favorably the nomination of Brig. Gen. Clifford Ross Powell, New Jersey National Guard, to be brigadier general in the National Guard of the United States; and also the nominations of several officers for appointment, by transfer, in the Regular Army, which were ordered to be placed on the Executive Calendar.

POSTMASTER AT TULLAHOMA, TENN.
